The Philippine Republic owes its existence to the United States. In World War II American soldiers invaded the Japanese-held islands and many gave their lives to free the Filipinos. The 37th Infantry of my State of Ohio was in the forefront of that invasion. Many young men from Ohio were killed and wounded in combat in driving the Japanese from those islands. Since 1899, Americans have given lives and treasures which in the end created the Philippine Republic. Yet, the utmost President Johnson had forthcoming from the Philippine Government was not one combat soldier but simply 1,500 noncombat engineers. Now, after Ferdinand Marcos has been reelected, these are being withdrawn.

The American public at last knows that the United States paid the Philippine Government more than $39 million for those nonfighting troops. It must be startling to Americans to know that they equipped those noncombat engineers, and that they provided the entire pay of the noncombat engineers of the Philippine Republic at a cost ranging from $33 a month for each private to $210 a month for Filipino officers. Those noncombat engineers of the Philippine Republic were mercenaries. Unfortunately, that is not all.

The U.S. Government under treaty arrangements with the Philippine Republic maintains Clark Air Force Base about 60 miles from Manila. At this base we have hospitals where severely wounded and maimed soldiers are flown from Vietnam. Many lives have been saved by our Army and Navy surgeons working around the clock at our hospitals there. Also, American aircraft and crews are based there. Americans are entitled to know that there has been an insurrection raging against the government of Ferdinand Marcos for many months and without any act of Congress nor congressional authority whatever our combat planes on many occasions have bombed and strafed outposts of Huk guerrillas waging an insurrection against the present government.

It is not generally known, but in the event of an armed attack on the Philippine Republic, the United States is explicitly committed to a pledge that any such attacks would be instantly repelled. President Eisenhower in 1958 and President Johnson in 1964 publicly used the "instantly repel" language in joint communiques with Philippine leaders. This pledge was also formally included in a moratorium of agreement between the American ambassador and the Philippine foreign secretary. This blanket commitment to the Philippines was made without congressional approval. It is in direct conflict with our formal obligations under the SEATO Treaty.

Despite this commitment, despite more than $1 billion given in two decades to the Philippine Republic, President Johnson had to hire a noncombatant Filipino construction battalion to go to Vietnam at a cost to American taxpayers of approximately $39 million. Now, even that paltry contribution is being withdrawn by President Marcos.

Pentagon officials requested an appropriation of $5,200 million to supply ammunition to GI's and marines fighting in that immoral, undeclared war in Vietnam. Therefore, more than $21,000 would be spent for ammunition to shoot at each Vietcong or North Vietnamese soldier. At the same time, the administration has requested only $3,200 million for aid to education for the 58 million schoolchildren and college students of our Nation. The philosophy of this administration is clearly revealed in the fact that it is willing to spend $55 for education for each American child and $21,666.67 to shoot at each Vietcong and North Vietnamese.

Mr. President, we Americans have every reason to marvel that notwithstanding the madness and in fact national insanity on the part of leaders who have involved us in Vietnam and other areas of Southeast Asia, our Government remains solvent. It is true that all Americans bear a heavy tax burden. Here is how some of the taxpayers' money is spent and all without any authorization of the representatives of our people.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Two letters from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of orders suspending deportation of certain aliens together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law pertaining to each alien, and the reasons for ordering such suspension (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON THE JOHN F. KENNEDY CENTER FOR THE PERFORMING ARTS

A letter from the Chairman, John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the Center for the period July 1, 1968, through June 30, 1969 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Public Works.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A petition, signed by Scott G. Reed, and sundry other citizens of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in support of the Vietnam moratorium; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. RIBICOFF:

S. 3194. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Theodosia E. Daley; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SPONG:

S. 3195. A bill to provide a 5-percent increase in certain annuities payable from the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(The remarks of Mr. SPONG when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

S. 3195—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL PROVIDING A 5-PERCENT INCREASE IN CERTAIN ANNUITIES PAYABLE FROM THE CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT AND DISABILITY FUND

Mr. SPONG. Mr. President, on October 20, the President signed H.R. 9825, the bill amending the Civil Service Retirement Act. That bill included a provision for a 5 percent cost-of-living increase to those retired by October 31, 1969. On October 29, just 9 days after the bill was approved and just 2 days before the increase provision expired, the Secretary of Defense announced extensive reductions in many Defense installations throughout the Nation. Although the total effect of these reductions is not yet known and probably will not be known for several months, it is conceivable that, faced with the prospect of a reduction in grade resulting from a reduction in force, a number of employees would find it advantageous to retire now.

Also, I have received reports that a number of longtime career employees, both female clerical and secretarial and male journeymen employees, are considering retirement because they have been informed they will be required, in addition to their regular duties and outside their regular working hours, to perform custodial services.

It seems probable that a number of individuals eligible for retirement faced with these alternatives may retire and thereby eliminate at least some of those separations making it unnecessary to separate other career employees not now eligible for retirement.

In the light of this, I am today introducing a bill to extend the time during which individuals may qualify for the 5-percent increase until May.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3195) to provide a 5-percent increase in certain annuities payable from the civil service retirement and disability fund, introduced by Mr. SPONG, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION

S. 2919

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New York (Mr. GOODELL), I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the names of the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) be added as cosponsors of S. 2919, the Criminal Offender Rehabilitation and Crime Prevention Act of 1969.

S. 2920

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President on behalf of the Senator from New York (Mr. GOODELL) I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing the names of the Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) be added as cosponsors of S. 2920, to amend the Bail Reform Act of 1966 to authorize consideration of danger to the community in setting conditions of release, to provide for pretrial detention of dangerous persons, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 61

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MCCARTHY), I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Idaho (Mr. JORDAN) be added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 61, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF A RESOLUTION

SENATE RESOLUTION 285

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) be added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 285, to authorize a study by the Foreign Relations Committee, pursuant to its jurisdiction in matters relating to the relations of the United States with foreign nations generally and to the United Nations organization, of the possibilities for international cooperation and cost sharing in the exploration of space.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969—AMENDMENTS

AMENDMENTS NOS. 329 AND 330

Mr. HARTKE submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 13270) to reform the income tax laws, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 331

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. HOLLINGS, and Mr. PERCY, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by us, jointly, to the section of the Tax Reform Act dealing with private foundations, which would delete the "40 Year Rule" (section 507(b)(2)).

What follows is an outline—to be amplified later—of the basic reasons why we have joined in this amendment.

First, we believe that an arbitrary limitation on the life of foundations runs counter to the intent of the Tax Reform Act and would create a bad precedent.

We strongly support the provisions of the Finance Committee bill designed to correct abuses in the operations of foundations. The Finance Committee has adopted a number of such commendable reforms. However, the 40-year rule contributes neither to reform nor to the correction of abuses.

We do not believe that it is good policy or good law to reform an institution and at the same time act to destroy it. It makes little sense to call for capital punishment—after 40 years probation.

If the Congress this year legislates a time limit on the tax-exempt status of foundations, it might, with equal logic, legislate a time limit on the tax-exempt status of hospitals, labor unions, schools, churches, and trade associations.

Second, there is general agreement by all who have investigated the subject that most foundations have done a first-rate job in bringing private initiative and diverse approaches to the solution of our Nation's problems. The list of foundation accomplishments is heartening and long. Among the dramatic achievements of foundations have been: fantastic improvement of wheat and rice yields; prevention of hookworm, malaria, and yellow fever; early research in rocketry; discovery of insulin, penicillin, and polio vaccines; and preservation of invaluable open space for public recreation. Population planning, public television, educational reform, scholarly research, adult education, criminal justice, voter registration, and the arts and humanities have also received great contributions from private foundations.

The list of foundation abuses is notably short, and for the most part, can be traced to a small group of institutions which would be reformed, or lose their tax-exempt status, under the committee's bill. Yet the 40-year rule makes no distinction between nonoperating foundations which have made vital contributions to the Nation and to our society and those which serve individuals as tax shelters only. The 40-year rule would simply destroy them all.

If foundations are fundamentally bad, we should legislate them out of existence; if they are fundamentally good—as we believe them to be—their abuses should be curbed and their charitable work encouraged and sustained.

Third, the 40-year rule disregards the fact that older foundations are often as effective and worthwhile as the younger ones; indeed the older foundations are among the most responsive, independent, and professional private philanthropic institutions in our society, perhaps for the very reason that they have gained experience with age.

Fourth, foundations are not controlled by the "dead hand" of the past. Most of their charters are broad, and outdated trust instruments can be changed under existing laws. Moreover, they are directed by living, responsible trustees—men of distinction and leadership, including some who have served or are serving in this body. The ironical fact is that foundations are more frequently charged with being too innovative and venturesome than with being too hidebound and tradition-minded.

Fifth, foundations do not—as some have alleged—hold an increasing share of the Nation's wealth. The facts are that although the absolute value of assets held by foundations has increased over the years, the total of their assets today represents a smaller portion of the Nation's wealth than 10 years ago. In 1969, some 22,000 foundations, together hold less than seven-tenths of 1 percent of the Nation's wealth.

Sixth, the perpetual existence accorded foundations is not unique. In 43 States businesses may be incorporated in perpetuity. Most nonprofit tax-exempt institutions such as churches, labor unions, schools, social welfare organizations, trade associations, and hospitals are not subject to an arbitrarily determined expiration date. We agree that the tax-exempt status of individual foundations which no longer serve charitable purposes should be terminated—but this can be done under present law. It would be wrong to destroy all foundations—good and bad—at an arbitrary time.

And it would be clearly discriminatory to single out foundations—from among all tax-exempt institutions—for such treatment.

Seventh, Treasury and others who have systematically examined this question have rejected an arbitrary limitation. In its 1965 report, under the Johnson administration, the Treasury opposed the idea of a death sentence. Two months ago, under the Nixon administration, the Treasury accepted and reaffirmed that position before the Finance Committee. The Peterson Commission on Foundations and the House Ways and Means Committee have also rejected it.

Eighth, an arbitrary 40-year life would be extremely harmful to the operations of foundations. Recent Treasury testimony has made clear the extraordinary staffing difficulties which foundations would confront, especially in later years. Precipitous and wasteful disbursement of capital would be encouraged. Creation of new foundations would be discouraged.

Mr. President, in sum, we believe the "death sentence" is unwise policy and bad law.

It is a clear case of "overkill" under the guise of reform.

It strikes at the root of private initiative and the private sector.

It is a blow against private philanthropy and charitable purposes.

We urge its deletion.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

AMENDMENT NO. 332

Mr. YARBOROUGH (for himself, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. MONDALE, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. METCALF, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. HART, Mr. YOUNG of Ohio, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BAYH, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. NELSON, Mr. PELL, Mr. GRAVEL, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. CASE, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. GOODELL, Mr. PERCY, Mr. COOK, Mr. SCHWEIKER, and Mr. JAVITS) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to House bill 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE BIG TAX LOOPHOLE: ASSETS TRANSFERRED AT DEATH

Mr. TYDINGS. I am submitting an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the pending tax bill which will close perhaps the largest single loophole in our tax system. This is the present treatment of unrealized appreciation of assets transferred at death.

My amendment will correct an injustice against the average taxpayer more onerous than even an excessive oil and mineral depletion allowance.

It will accomplish real, long-term reform in the pending tax bill by ultimately recovering an estimated $2.5 billion in annual revenue.

It will bring within the Federal tax system each year an estimated $20 billion of appreciated wealth which now forever escapes taxation.

I testified before the Finance Committee this fall to urge adoption of this amendment. I believe the final form of the Senate Finance Committee's reported bill makes adoption of my amendment necessary as a matter of fiscal responsibility.

THE PROBLEM

Under present law, when an individual sells a capital asset—stocks, real estate, et cetera—which has increased in value the appreciation is subject to a capital gains tax based on the difference between cost and sale price. However, if appreciated property is held until the owner dies, the appreciation escapes capital gains taxation completely. The heir receives a tax free stepup in basis, that is, he is only responsible for an increase in value realized from the time he inherits the property until the time he sells it.

The result is a tremendous loophole in our Federal tax system which permits $15 to $20 billion a year in capital gains to escape taxation, and costs the Treasury an estimated $2.5 billion a year in potential revenue.

Compare, for a rough demonstration, the present tax loophole for assets transferred at death with the present gift tax. If Mr. A, for example, gives his heir a gift of stock worth $5 million which he purchased 10 years ago for $1 million, the entire $4 million of appreciated value is subject to taxation. But if Mr. A. dies and leaves this same stock to his heirs through his estate, the same $4 million of appreciated value is—except for estate taxes—forever exempted from taxation.

The Tydings amendment would close this loophole by keeping the original cost of an asset as the basis for determining a capital gains tax when the asset is eventually sold, even though the asset passed through an estate. Importantly, however, the amendment would add to the original cost, as the basis for a capital gains tax, the amount of the estate tax paid on the asset when it passed through the estate.

In other words, when an heir sold appreciated property, he would have to pay a capital gains tax on the entire increase in the property's value including that which occurred when the decedent held the property as well as on, as is now the case, the increase in value which occurred while the heir held it.

However, to avoid the problem of double taxation, the amendment would diminish the amount on which an heir would have to pay a capital gains tax when he sold the property by the amount of estate tax paid on the asset when inherited. This would be accomplished by increasing the basis carried over at death by the amount of the estate tax paid on the asset when it passed through the estate.

In addition to its injustice to the average taxpayer, this loophole also produces an undesirable economic side effect of distorting investment decisionmaking. Older investors who would normally sell assets and reinvest the proceeds hold on to them, knowing that, at death, neither their estates nor their heirs will ever have to pay the capital gains tax on the appreciated value. Capital which would otherwise be free to flow into sound and productive investments is locked in.

A third important point is that the amendment would restore long-term fiscal balance to the tax bill before the Senate. As you know, the current tax proposal is expected to yield a long-term fiscal deficit of roughly $2.5 billion—by 1979. When this amendment is fully effective, the Treasury estimates it would provide an additional $2 to $2.5 billion a year in revenue—precisely the amount needed to balance the tax reform bill.

Therefore, enacting this amendment would: First, eliminate a major inequity in our tax system which favors a chosen few; second, help remove an incentive to hold on to investments that market conditions dictate ought to be sold; and third, restore long-term fiscal balance to the tax proposal currently before the Senate.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

AMENDMENT NO. 334

Mr. McCARTHY (for himself and Mr. HARTKE) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to House bill 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 335

Mr. McINTYRE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 336

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 337

Mr. GORE (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CANNON, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MONDALE, Mr. MONTOYA, Mr. MOSS, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. YOUNG of Ohio, Mr. PASTORE, and Mr. McCLELLAN) proposed amendments to House bill 13270, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERCY proposed amendments to House bill 13270, supra, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. McGOVERN, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. HARTKE, and Mr. McINTYRE I submit a further amendment to be proposed to H.R. 13270, the tax reform bill. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

This is one of a number of small business amendments that have been proposed, and it is my hope that the Members of the Senate will give them their careful consideration and support.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

AMENDMENT NO. 340

Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. CASE) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

(The remarks of Mr. JAVITS when he submitted the amendment appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the period for transaction of routine morning business has been concluded, the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

PENTAGON PROPAGANDA

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I noted in this morning's New York Times story about my statement yesterday that Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs Daniel Z. Henkin said that the five military service television crews that have been turning out newsfilm for Vietnam since mid-1966 were considered "an experiment that would be reviewed for its effectiveness."

I welcome the fact that this experiment is being reviewed after 3 years and look forward to its cancellation either by Executive action or the amendment I plan to place on the Defense appropriation bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 2, 1969]

PENTAGON "PROPAGANDA" IS ASSAILED BY FULBRIGHT

(By Warren Weaver)

WASHINGTON, December 1.—Senator J. W. Fulbright charged today that the Defense Department was spending millions of dollars on "public relations" programs that promote military activity rather than merely furnish information about it.

The Arkansas Democrat said he would move to strike from the defense appropriation bill all financing for five television camera crews working in Vietnam and producing film with "A propaganda rather than a journalistic thrust."

"It is one thing," the Senator said in a floor speech, "for the Defense Department to have employes available to provide quickly and responsively—factual information to both the public and the press, upon request.

"It is quite another when that department and the individual military services use taxpayers' money to generate and promote public support to military weapons and military programs."

CITES COST FIGURES

Senator Fulbright said conservative estimates indicated that the Pentagon was now spending $27.9-million for public relations, compared to $2.8-million ten years ago. He said he thought "the real total figure is much larger."

Today's was the first of four speeches that Mr. Fulbright will give this week on the public relations activities of the military. In the others he will discuss specific promotional activities of the Navy, Air Force and Army.

Mr. Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, indicated that he would move to impose a dollar ceiling on Pentagon public relations spending and restrict it to information rather than propaganda when the defense appropriation bill reaches the floor later this month.

In response, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for public affairs, Daniel Z. Henkin, said he was operating on instructions from Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird that "propaganda has no place in the Defense Department public information program."

Promising that the department would give the Fulbright speeches "careful study," Mr. Henkin said the television crews in Vietnam were "an experiment" that would be reviewed for its effectiveness.

BUDGET CUT

The assistant secretary noted that he had already cut the $3.7-million budget of his own public affairs office by $338,000 this year.

Senator Fulbright singled out for "special concern" these aspects of Defense Department public relations work:

Cross-country tours for selected community leaders to a variety of defense installations, by which "the Defense Department is able to propagandize and influence attitudes toward their activities."

A program of providing military leaders as speakers had made 59 such appearances from August, 1968, to May, 1969 * * * professional soldier whose mission was to act as Chief of Staff of the Army."

Production of films made available to the public on subjects like Vietnam and Communism, "which, in order to support the Administration or the military establishment's point of view at the time, usually distort key facts."

LEGAL POSITION QUESTIONED

Senator Fulbright questioned the justification or legal authority for the Defense Department's producing newsfilm on what it called "feature aspects of the military participation in Southeast Asia."

Perhaps Vice President Agnew, who last week appealed to the networks to put on different commentators, has not felt the necessity to complain about the TV coverage from Vietnam because he knows that at least a portion of it was emanating directly from Administration sources in Vietnam," Mr. Fulbright declared.

The Senator concluded that "there is enough Administration propaganda on Vietnam being provided the American public through speeches and statements, without providing this additional outlet in the guise of 'objective' newsfilm stories."

THE NAVY PUBLIC AFFAIRS PROGRAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, shortly after assuming office, Secretary of Defense Laird told the Defense Establishment that "Propaganda has no place in the Department of Defense public information programs." There is a narrow line between "information" and "propaganda." Secretary Laird apparently meant that the information programs of the Department should not be used for propaganda purposes, defined by Webster as the "dissemination of ideas, information, gossip, or the like, for the purpose of helping or injuring a person, an institution, a cause, etc." The military services do not seem to appreciate the distinction; each service's public affairs program is not aimed at providing the public with unvarnished facts, but at persuading it that the programs and weapons systems of the Army, Navy, or Air Force—as the case may be—should have the first claim on public funds and are the key to peace. The Navy's public affairs effort typifies the competition within the military services for the public's affections.

Mr. President, I digress for a moment to refer to a story published in this morning's newspaper in which it is estimated that the weapons system now under construction, I suppose one would say, through the Pentagon, are now estimated to run $20 billion over the estimates.

This is the largest figure I have seen. We have seen various figures for the Minuteman and the C–5A. However, the accumulative figures published in this morning's newspaper reveal that it is now estimated that the costs will be $20 billion more than the original estimates.

The Secretary of the Navy, setting forth the 1969 objectives for Navy public relations, stated that "Public affairs activities should be directed toward gaining the understanding and support of American citizens through active public information and community relations programs." Among the items to be emphasized in 1969 public affairs activities were:

(1) "The need for modern ships, aircraft, and equipment throughout the Navy"; and to justify the billions required for those "ships, aircraft, and equipment" the public would be duly warned of:

(2) "The challenge of the continued growth of Soviet sea power and its expanding worldwide operations."

I ask unanimous consent that a memorandum dealing with the Navy public affairs plan be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[SECNAV Notice 5720]

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., February 24, 1969.

From: Secretary of the Navy.
To: All Ships and Stations.
Subj.: Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan, 1969 (NPAP 1–69) Planning Directive.
Ref.: (a) U.S. Navy Public Affairs Regulations (NAVSO 9–1035).

1. Purpose: To promulgate public affairs planning guidance and the Department of the Navy specific public affairs objectives for calendar year 1969.

2. Background: The Navy and Marine Corps (the Naval Service) must have the support of the American people in order to attract high caliber personnel and obtain modern ships, aircraft and equipment needed to be an effective element of the United States defense forces.

(a) Public affairs activities should be directed toward gaining the understanding and support of American citizens through active public information and community relations programs.

(b) The public affairs mission and basic objectives, set forth in reference (a), are intended to form a common basis for planning and coordination of command efforts so as to support each other and uniformly address major matters.

(c) Guidance and responsibilities for developing specific public affairs plans and programs by individual commands are contained in reference (a).

3. Specific public affairs objectives: The following specific public affairs objectives will be emphasized in the coming year:

(a) The combat and support roles of the Navy and Marine Corps in Southeast Asia.

(b) Recognition of the individual accomplishments of men and women of the Navy and Marine Corps.

(c) The need for modern ships, aircraft, and equipment throughout the Naval Service.

(e) The equal opportunity for members of all racial and ethnic groups within the Naval Service.

(f) The Marine Corps' Air-Ground Team and its role as the Nation's Amphibious Force-in-Readiness.

(g) Recognition of the increasing importance of Navy Oceanography for its vital role in national security and the benefits that accrue to the national welfare.

(h) The understanding of the Marine Corps' special capabilities for limited war.

4. Action: Public affairs planning by all commands will be in support of the basic Department of the Navy objectives and those special objectives listed above.

5. Cancellation: This Notice is cancelled on 31 December 1969.

JOHN W. WARNER,

[SECNAVNOTE 5720]

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., April 17, 1969.

From: Secretary of the Navy.
To: All Ships and Stations.
Subj: Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan, 1968 (NPAP 1–68).
Ref: (a) U.S. Navy Public Affairs Regulations (NAVSO P–1035).

(2) Reporting Format.

1. Purpose: To promulgate the Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan, 1968 (NPAP 1–68).

2. Background:

(a) The requirement for a Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan is contained in paragraph A–1006 of reference (a), and was originally established by a SECNAV Notice in 1965 to ensure an effective and highly coordinated annual public affairs program for the Navy and the Marine Corps.

(b) Guidance and responsibilities for development of specific public affairs plans and programs by individual commands and methodology are included in reference (a) and enclosure (1).

3. Action: Action addressees will furnish the Chief of Information their public affairs plans implementing the Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan for calendar year 1968 within 30 days following the receipt of this plan. The Chief of Information is directed to coordinate addressees' efforts for the Secretary of the Navy to ensure effective and coordinated Navy and Marine Corps public affairs activities for calendar 1968.

4. Reports: Action addresses will report quarterly to the Chief of Information, beginning 30 June 1968, and each three months thereafter, in the format contained in enclosure (2), on their cumulative efforts to implement the Navy Department Public Affairs Plan. Reports Control symbol CHINFO 5720–3 is assigned this report which should reach the Chief of Information by the 15th of the month following each quarter to enable action addresses to consolidate the reporting data.

5. Cancellation: This Notice is canceled 31 December 1968.

CHARLES F. BAIRD,

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY PUBLIC AFFAIRS PLAN, 1968

1. Situation:

(a) The Navy and Marine Corps have vital roles in the national security. To fulfill them, each must have the best-trained personnel, the most modern equipment, and the necessary logistic support to establish and maintain a state of constantly high readiness.

(b) This readiness is attained only with the full support from the people of the United States and their Congress.

(c) Keeping the people and the Congress constantly informed in this area is, in large measure, the responsibility of the Office of Information of the Department of the Navy.

2. Mission: The public affairs mission of the Department of the Navy is to inform the public and the Naval Service about the Navy and Marine Corps as instruments of national policy, their operations, responsibilities and achievements of the men and women in the Navy and Marine Corps.

3. Basic Objectives:

(a) The basic public affairs objectives of the Department of the Navy in 1968 are to gain public understanding and support of:

(1) The combat and support roles of the Navy and Marine Corps in Vietnam.

(2) The importance of seapower in the nuclear age and the predominant role of the Navy in the field of nuclear propulsion.

(3) The need for an adequate, well-trained and well-equipped Naval Service together with the crucial need for qualified officers and enlisted men to keep it operating.

(4) The career advantages in the regular and reserve Naval Service.

(5) The predominant role of the Naval Service in ocean sciences, together with its activities in other scientific research.

(b) To make the public aware of the importance and high priority which Soviet Russia attaches to a significant seapower of its own.

4. Specific Objectives: U.S. Navy Public Affairs Regulations state:

"Certain aspects and programs of the Navy are of greater public interest than others and require greater support from the public, if they are to be effective. Some of these will be of a continuing nature; others are of short-term interest. Periodically a priority list of these is compiled. It constitutes the specific public affairs objectives of the Navy."

5. Execution: (a) The list that follows is in the priority which will be effective with publication of this Notice. Action addresses will tailor their 1968 public affairs programs within the broad limits of the following objectives:

(1) Vietnam:

(a) The Navy and Marines—primarily in Vietnam, but with no less emphasis wherever they may be.

(b) Construction by SEABEES in Vietnam and their general civic action role.

(2) Importance of the naval supply and logistical efforts and the need for a strong merchant marine.

(3) Recognition of individual officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps.

(4) Drama of naval research and development, and its role in providing new and better equipment and weapons systems.

(a) POSEIDON and the FBM weapons system.

(b) Potential of the SABMIS weapons system.

(5) The Navy and Marine Corps as careers.

(6) Contributions of the Navy and Marine Corps Reserve components, including the exploits of the more than 100,000 reservists on active duty.

(7) Special events including Navy Day, Armed Forces Day, the commissioning of JOHN F. KENNEDY (CVA–67), the recommissioning of NEW JERSEY (BB–62), and SEALAB III.

(8) Role of the Naval Service in United States diplomacy and in maintaining the freedom of the seas.

(9) Growth of the Soviet Navy and its expanding operations.

(b) It should be recognized that "spot news", interesting events that cannot be foreseen—combat operations, rescues, deeds of valor, deeds of compassion, awards, "newsworthy" incidents afloat and ashore, and similar accounts of the Navy and Marine Corps and their personnel always have a top priority; and, that invitations from groups outside the service for speakers, visits, displays and similar events rate closer to "spot news" in importance as a means of focusing public attention on the Naval Service.

(c) A series of annexes and appendices to the Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan is included. Annex A, the basic OPNAV Plan, sets forth specific Navy public affairs objectives. Annex B provides a public affairs plan in support of Marine Corps objectives.

6. Reports: Action addressees will submit reports in accordance with paragraph 4 of the transmittal Notice.

ANNEX A (OPNAN)

1. World-wide Naval Operations and Versatility:

(a) The Navy's effort in Vietnam is a classic portrayal of the effectiveness and flexibility of seapower. The ability of the Navy to project national policy will be exploited for public affairs value. The spectrum of the Navy's capabilities will be publicized, including strategic deterrence provided by Carrier Striking Forces and Fleet Ballistic Missile Submarines; security against the submarine threat provided by Hunter Killer Groups, will be emphasized along with the world-wide ambassadorial and public relations roles fulfilled by visiting Navymen.

(b) The Navy's mobility, readiness and versatility will be emphasized. The Navy's quick reaction time will be stressed whether in response to requests for naval gunfire/airborne support, international crises, or search and rescue missions.

(c) Major efforts will be devoted to maintaining public awareness of the deterrence of the Fleet Ballistic Missile Submarine, 'round-the-clock operations of the numbered fleets, and enhancement of western hemisphere solidarity achieved by UNITAS. Antarctic operations, the Navy Navigation Satellite System and Deep Submergence Systems Project provide excellent material to demonstrate the scope of Navy interest in national security and to scientific objectives.

(d) The FDL concept, meanwhile, is designed to provide high-speed military sealift and improve significantly our rapid military deployment capabilities. Together with airlift and land-based prepositioning of Army equipment, FDL will be an integral part of a U.S. national, rapid deployment system.

2. Freedom of the Seas and Diplomacy: World-wide naval operations and their versatility continue to demonstrate a necessity for the Navy to inform others of the danger to all free nations from encroachment on the high seas. About 98 per cent of all military equipment and supplies to support the United States in Southeast Asia is provided by sealift. The ability of the Navy to retain unrestricted use of the sea is vital.

3. Nuclear Power:

(a) There are now four nuclear-powered surface ships in commission. The commissioning of Will Rogers, the Navy's 41st Polaris-launching submarine, marked completion of the Fleet Ballistic Missile Submarine construction program. Construction is scheduled to begin this year on the Nimitz (CVA(N)–68). Over 25 nuclear attack submarines are currently under construction. The advantages of nuclear power will continue to be stressed. The Navy seeks continuing introduction to the fleet of additional nuclear-powered ships, concentrating on ships where return in effectiveness is greatest.

(b) An associated area is the requirement for an educational program leading to acceptance of nuclear-powered ships in harbors throughout the world. Engineering reliability and the safety record of the Navy's nuclear ships over the past 13 years are a matter of great pride.

(c) Continuing day-to-day safe operation of nuclear-powered ships and land-based nuclear-powered facilities will help gain public acceptance of atomic energy.

4. Growth and Expanding Operations of the Soviet Navy:

(a) Events indicate the Soviet Navy, increasing in number and quality of ships, plans to deploy more fleet units beyond its coastal sea areas.

(b) It is necessary to develop public understanding of the nature of this change in its sea-power from a largely continental one, with naval operations in coastal waters, to one not limited to the Eurasian continent. Its activities now include more widespread operations, including operations adjacent to the territorial waters of the United States.

5. Anti-submarine Warfare:

(b) Despite public focus on Southeast Asia, the importance and the role of ASW will continue to be emphasized. Efforts will be directed to the significance of the role of ASW forces in the Vietnam War, as well as to describe the total world-wide underseas threat and the important mission of the carrier-airplane combination in offensive anti-submarine warfare. Priority emphasis will be directed toward naval personnel to keep them informed and conversant in the ASW area—an area recognized as vital to the security of the United States.

6. The Navy/Marine Corps Team: Operations in Vietnam will continue to be emphasized to enhance public understanding of the effectiveness of seapower in modern war. Carrier and amphibious operations, gunfire support missions, logistic support to all services, support of Vietnamese River Assault Groups, the construction effort in Vietnam, Marine Corps operations and Riverine Warfare will be emphasized to promote respect for the effort of the Naval Service in Southeast Asia. (Annex B deals in more detail with Marine Corps areas of interest.)

7. Personnel (See Appendices III and VI):

(a) In a free society, public support of almost every endeavor depends on the esteem in which it is held. This involves knowledge and senses of value, honor, pride and respect.

(b) Navy public affairs programs for 1968 will assume wider identification with life at sea and wider recognition for the problems, responsibilities and the rewards of the Naval Service and command at sea. Greater recognition will be given to personnel in the Navy, and the outstanding job they are doing.

(c) Youth, its contribution to our current manning efforts, as well as its influence in the family of the American public today, must be recognized (see Appendix VI).

8. Retention and Internal Information (see Appendix III):

(a) Maximum exposure will continue to be given to implementation of Retention Task Force recommendations as they occur, and the Family Information Branch of the Office of Information will be given wide latitude in the communication of internal information to all personnel and their dependents.

(b) Use of Armed Forces Radio and Television will be expanded for internal news of interest and concern to Navy personnel and their families.

(c) Use of the seapower film series and seapower presentation to internal and external information media will be utilized to insure that Navy personnel and their families as well as other "publics" appreciate the Navy's role in maritime national defense.

9. Naval Logistics and the American Merchant Marine:

(a) Some 98 per cent of U.S. supplies move by sea to Southeast Asia, and it is obvious that worldwide military sealift (MSTS) operated by the Navy and backed by a Merchant Marine of modern, fast cargo ships, is indispensable to successful deployment and support of all United States services overseas in peace and war. This is especially important in maintaining the flexible response of Marine Corps landing teams.

(b) The need for modernization (qualitative and quantitative) of the United States Merchant Marine will be pressed vigorously. The United States now has about 90 privately-owned active ships engaged in oceanborne commerce. Of the 600 engaged in foreign trade, about 60 tankers have speeds of about 15 knots and about 116 dry cargo ships in operation or building have speeds over 20 knots.

(c) The Navy's capacity to respond to mission requirements and emergency needs is dependent on the quality of its logistics operations. United States naval power today includes guided missiles, nuclear-powered vessels and complex electronic systems as well as many ships and types of equipment of earlier design. All of these systems work under constant threat of malfunction, making it imperative that components and repair items be constantly stocked and readily provided where they are needed.

(d) The Navy Supply system is a global, computerized system—comprised of inventory control points, supply centers, supply depots and ships' and shore activities' supply departments. Shore stations ranging from Southeast Asia to Iceland, and ships operating around the world are constantly being supplied and provisioned.

10. Construction:

(a) Awareness of the Navy role as the construction agent for the Department of Defense in Southeast Asia will be stressed.

(b) The Naval Facilities Engineering Command is responsible for all civilian contracts construction in Southeast Asia, now totaling $1.5 billion, the single greatest construction program in world history.

(c) Direct Seabee military construction continues to expand. All battalions are committed to Vietnam, and more than one-half the battalions in-country are increasingly engaged in providing tactical construction support to U.S. and allied troops under fire.

(d) Seabee Teams, especially selected, trained and equipped to teach construction skills to villagers, are effectively forwarding the U.S. civic action mission in Vietnam and Thailand, gaining respect and affection of local people toward the United States.

11. Research and Development:

(a) All scientific discoveries contain elements of drama and are potential sources of news. The following is a list of major areas to be emphasized: Contributions of Navy Laboratories; Advanced Electronics in the Navy; Computers in the Navy; Oceanography—Man in the Sea; the Modern Missile Navy; Navy Experience in Desalinization; Navy's Basic Point Defense Surface Missile; the All Weather Carrier Landing System; Counterinsurgency; Arctic Research Laboratory; the Navy in Space; Air and Water Pollution; computer-aided education technology; deep submergence and medical developments.

(b) Automatic Data Processing (ADP) has become more and more a daily function of Navy administration. The use of ADP will be publicized to promote the Navy's interest in administrative efficiency and economy.

12. Strike Force:

(a) The worth of our sea-based tactical air force (CVAs/CVA(N)s) has been validated in Vietnam. Attack Carriers and embarked Air Wings have furnished almost half of the total tactical air effort in that theater.

(b) It must be assured that Attack Carriers (CVAs) are modern and able effectively to support increasingly sophisticated tactical (VF/VA) aircraft. The John F. Kennedy (CVA–67) will complete construction and join the fleet in 1968. A second nuclear-powered carrier, the Chester W. Nimitz (CVA(N)–68), is currently under construction and scheduled to join the fleet in FY 1972.

(c) Strike Warfare operations, spearheaded by attack carrier task forces, will continue to be emphasized to enhance public understanding of seapower as an instrument of national policy.

13. Oceanography (see Appendix V): The President's Science Advisory Committee Report on "Effective Use of the Sea" sets forth far-reaching implications on the oceans' importance to national security. The committee recommended that a national ocean program concern "effective use of the sea for all purposes currently considered for terrestrial environment: commerce, industry, recreation and settlement; as well as for knowledge and understanding". There is nothing in the science of oceanography which does not affect the Navy, and our efforts and potential in this area must be exploited.

14. The Naval Reserve (see Appendix VII):

(a) Internal and external information programs will include emphasis on providing a two-way flow of information designed to educate the public on the need for and the importance of the Naval Reserve—why it exists, how it works and what it does. As a corollary, the Navy's internal information program will keep the inactive Naval Reserve abreast of current operations and the contributions of the Navy and its active duty forces.

(b) More than 100,000 Naval Reservists are serving with the Navy's active duty forces either voluntarily or in the performance of their two-year obligation. Approximately 13 per cent of personnel manning ships and stations throughout the world are Naval Reservists, and Naval Reservists provide the backup force of men with the training and skills needed in the event of mobilization.

APPENDIX I—NAVAL MATERIAL

1. Purpose: To formulate the Naval Material Command public information plan in support of the Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan, 1968.

2. Objective: To attain increasing public awareness, understanding and support of the Navy's many achievements in the fields of science and technology and the major role played by the Naval Material Command in the support of the Navy and Marine Corps.

3. Programs: (a) Public Affairs Program Highlights for calendar year 1968 under cognizance of the Chief of Naval Material and supported by the various and specific subordinate commands are listed below. Additional Public Affairs Programs are listed in Tab A and are maintained in the Naval Material Command Public Affairs Officers' Future Book.

(1) Ocean Science and Engineering-Research Development Test and Evaluation focused on deep ocean engineering, involving ocean-bottom studies, effects of submergence on materials, personnel existence in ocean depths, search, rescue and salvage vehicles and systems.

(2) Laboratory and Management Personnel. To highlight laboratory accomplishments and the caliber of personnel in the field of management.

(3) Naval Material Command Magazine—Target late in CY–68.

(4) Ship Acquisition Programs.

(a) DX/DXG Program. To provide vitally-needed escort ships for the Navy of the 1970's. This program is scheduled to go into contract definition phase.

(b) LHA Program. To provide the Navy with a new ship type for amphibious warfare incorporating features of the LPH, LPD, LSD and AKA. This program is in the contract definition phase. Subsequent to evaluation of contractor proposals, development and production contracts for the LHA will be awarded.

(c) FDL Program. A new procurement plan for the FDL ships has been approved by the Secretary of Defense and the program is to be resubmitted to Congress. The new procurement plan has retained as many advantages of the Total Package Contract as possible.

(5) Automatic Carrier Landing Systems (ACLS)—continued test and evaluation of the SPN–41 on board CV with latest Navy jet aircraft.

(6) Resource Management at station (base) level to design, develop, test and evaluate a Resources Management System.

(7) F–111B Aircraft. Limited field and carrier trials.

(8) A–7A (CORSAIR II). The return of the Navy's newest operational aircraft from its first combat tour.

(9) Accelerated Strike Aircraft Program (ASAPR). The dynamic processes involved in the production and rework of current fleet aircraft.

(10) Air-to-Surface Missiles. To pay tribute to the Navy Industry team of ordnance developers whose foresight made possible the nigh percentage of weaponry now available to the operating forces.

(11) CH–53. Explain the role, mission and features of the latest and most capable helicopter available to Navy and Marine Corps today.

(12) VANS. The unique forward area avionics workshops, prepared by Naval Air Rework Facilities now being deployed to remote areas on short notice to serve aviation units of the Atlantic and Pacific Fleets.

4. Industry Indoctrination: Indoctrination of industry in the procedures for clearing industry-originated material for release to the public and efforts to expedite the present clearance review system within the Naval Material Command.

5. Implementation: Continued emphasis will be placed on publicizing programs listed in paragraph 3 and Tab A, through employment of accepted public information practices. These include, but are not limited to news media, technical publications, Navy films, TV and radio.

TAB A—OTHER PUBLIC AFFAIRS PROGRAMS TO BE DEVELOPED

Other public affairs programs to be developed during the year include:

(a) Dedication of Conical Shock Tube Test Facility.

(b) Naval Weapons Laboratory, Dahlgren, Va. 1968—50th Anniversary.

(c) Navy's Natural Resources Conservation Program.

(d) Study of Radioisotope Devices.

(e) Seabee Battalion military construction in Republic of Vietnam.

(f) Naval Hospital Construction; Oakland, California.

(g) C–3 (Poseidon) Testing.

(h) Advanced Planning Briefings for Industry.

(i) NMC Laboratory Accomplishments.

(j) Phoenix Missile Program.

(k) Shipbuilding and Conversion Program; Apollo Ship Conversion.

(l) Hydrofoil Research Vessel.

(m) General Ship Related Programs.

(n) Talk quick/Autosevocom-Interim secure-voice system.

(o) Microelectronics in the Navy.

(p) Satellite Communications (SATCOM).

(q) Development and use of weaponry for riverine warfare.

(r) Advanced missile programs.

(s) Mine and undersea warfare.

(t) New developments in guns and projectiles for future ships.

APPENDIX II—BUMED

1. The basic purposes of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery's Public Affairs Program are to:

(a) Create an awareness of the variety and scope of the Navy Medical Department's responsibilities and activities.

(b) To publicize accomplishments.

(c) To point up further objectives.

(d) To establish and justify the requirements necessary for achieving these goals.

2. The program is addressed to those entitled to medical service as well as to the general public. A proper image of the Navy Medical Department is essential if understanding and support by both the internal and external publics, is to be achieved and maintained.

3. The agenda for accomplishing the public affairs plan is presented under the following categories:

(a) Medical Support to Military Operations in Southeast Asia.

(1) Medical support to forces in the Vietnam area:

(a) Seventh Fleet.

(b) III MAF.

(c) USS RESPOSE, USS SANCTUARY.

(e) Naval hospitals—Guam, Yokosuka, and Subic Bay.

(f) River Assault Groups.

(g) Market Time.

(h) Game Warden.

(i) SEABEES.

(j) Dental support in Vietnam.

(k) Training of a flight surgeon as a parachutist and assignment to a Para-medical Team at Cubi Point.

(2) Preventive Medicine in Vietnam:

(a) Preventive Medicine Program.

(b) Vector Control Program.

(3) Other Medical Programs:

(a) Civic Action Programs.

(b) Military Provincial Hospital Assistance Program (MILPHAP).

(c) Dental Contributions to Civic Action Programs.

(b) Other Operational Medicine.

(1) Medical support to NASA-manned space flight operations (surgical teams to recovery fleet, naval hospital recovery teams, medical specialty teams, port medical liaison teams, flight surgeon medical monitors and pre- and post-flight medical evaluators).

(2) Aeromedical team visits to operating units (evaluate fatigue and morale factors).

(3) Medical Aspects of Man-in-the-Sea.

(4) Control of insects by aerial spraying from helicopters.

(5) Medical aspects of Operation "Deep Freeze".

(6) Preventive Medicine Unit services, including epidemiologic investigations, to units ashore and afloat.

(7) Assignment of a flight surgeon to Manned Orbiting Laboratory, Naval Space Systems Activity, Los Angeles, California.

(8) Assignment of a flight surgeon as scientist/astronaut.

(c) Clinical Medicine and Patient Care (excluding Southeast Asia).

(1) Progress of construction at Naval Hospitals, Oakland and Jacksonville.

(2) Availability of medical facilities and services both ashore and afloat.

(3) Doctor-patient relations: continue to foster mutual understanding and appreciation.

(4) Continuing critical review of suggestions, complaints and congratulations.

(5) Plans and legislation for improvements and expansion of medical care facilities and services.

(6) Intensified program for education of dependents and their sponsors' problems in providing medical care.

(7) Expanded dependents medical care, retired members and their dependents care of Military Medical Benefits Amendment.

(8) Family planning services for dependents of Active Duty and Retired Members.

(9) Preventive Dentistry.

(10) Establishment of Naval Hospital, Orlando, Florida.

(11) Approval by Congress for U.S. Naval Hospital, Roosevelt Roads, Puerto Rico.

(12) Audio-Visual Training film "LSD", discussing the dangers of personal, illicit experimentation with the drug.

(13) Audio-Visual Training in Mental Health Series "Trip to Where" depicting dangers (personal and career-wise) of usage of illicit drugs (LSD, marijuana, amphetamines, barbiturates).

(d) Training Facilities and Programs:

(1) Training as inducement for career in Navy medicine (medical student program, intern programs, residency training, subspecialty training).

(a) Medical Student Program.

(b) Naval Intern Program.

(c) Residency Training Program.

(2) U.S. Naval Dental Corps Dental Officer Education Program.

(3) U.S. Naval Dental Corps Continuing Education Courses.

(4) Training as career incentive for retention of Medical Service Corps officers.

(5) "Flight Surgeon Handbook"

(6) Continuing review of training facilities and educational programs.

(7) Training as inducement for a career in Navy Nursing.

(8) Training as career incentive for retention of enlisted Hospital Corpsmen.

(9) Global Medicine Series—To acquaint medical personnel with tropical diseases and other illnesses not common to the United States.

(10) MILPHAP Team Orientation—Training in tropical medicine, physical conditioning and Vietnamese language.

(11) Computer-programmed course of instruction for laboratory diagnosis of malaria.

(e) Research:

(1) Medical Research directly related to Vietnam operations.

(a) Use of frozen blood under combat conditions.

(b) Shock studies of combat wounded.

(c) Combat surgery.

(d) Combat performance prediction.

(e) Immersion foot prophylaxis study.

(f) Diarrheal and infectious disease; epidemiology, control and prevention.

(2) Medical Research related to other military operations.

(a) Control and prevention of Meningococcal infection.

(b) Underwater medical research.

(1) SEALAB III.

(2) Other oceanographic application.

(c) Human Effectiveness:

MarCorps Enlisted personnel.

Aviation personnel.

Submarine personnel.

(d) Assault Swimmer and Seal Team disease, casualty prediction and control.

(3) Other Medical Research.

(a) Study methods to improve training and education of Medical Department personnel.

(f) Recruiting and Retention Matters:

(1) Training as incentive for Navy medical service:

(a) Early commissioning program (Ensign medical and dental).

(b) Senior Medical Student Program.

(c) Naval Medical Intern Program.

(d) Service in Navy Medical Corps at selected schools.

(e) Navy Flight Surgeon.

(f) "Your Career in the U.S. Naval Dental Corps."

(g) Opporunities for careers as dietitians, occupational therapists and physical therapists.

(h) Annual Professional Meetings.

(i) Opportunities for careers in Navy Medical Service Corps.

(2) Student AMA Meeting in Chicago.

(3) Rekindle interest in Naval Medical Reserve.

(4) Active duty for Training for Reserve Officers.

(5) Military medical training program (MC, MSC, NC, USNR).

(6) Nursing Symposium (NC, USNR).

(7) Hospital Corpsmen Awards and Decorations.

(8) Continuous Review of Hospital Corpsmen Resource utilization.

(9) Retention of Nurse Corps officers on active duty.

(g) International Professional Activities:

(1) Navy assistance to foreign countries.

APPENDIX III—BUREAU OF NAVAL PERSONNEL

1. The major aim of public affairs activity by the Bureau of Naval Personnel in 1968 will be to gain recognition for individual Navymen and their accomplishments. The objectives of such a program are to contribute to high morale by fostering a favorable Navy image in the eyes of Navymen, to educe from the general public respect and admiration for Navymen and the Navy to foster, in the youth of America, the concept that a naval career is a challenging, rewarding, respectable and honorable profession.

2. Internal information programs will be aimed at two publics; Navymen and dependents/next of kin of Navymen.

(a) To this end, greater utilization of the facilities services of the Armed Forces News Bureau and Armed Forces Radio and Television networks is anticipated for the release of news of personnel policies, educational opportunities and other programs that benefit a Navy career.

(b) Continued support will be given to the Navy Wifeline's effort to keep Navy families informed in those areas that directly affect them.

(c) The role the Navyman plays in the Vietnam war will continue to be publicized.

3. External information programs and public affairs activities will include the following:

(a) Recruiting.

(b) First anniversary of the Master Chief Petty Officer of the Navy.

(c) The commissioning of the Naval Training Center, Orlando, Florida.

(f) First graduates of Immediate Master's Degree Program.

(g) Establishment of Hotel/Motel service in Washington area.

(h) Accomplishments of minority group members who are Navy personnel.

(i) Navy participation in Project 100,000.

(j) Navy participation in Project Transition.

(k) Dedication of Michelson Hall, U.S. Naval Academy.

(m) Chief of Chaplains News Conference.

(n) Special Medals and Awards.

APPENDIX IV—RESEARCH & DEVELOPMENT

1. Scientific discoveries are news, and media recognize and continually seek such material. The aim of the public affairs program of the Office of Naval Research is to present this material to the public through various news media in an organized manner. This program is divided into the following basic elements:

(a) News releases.

(b) Exhibits.

(c) Scientific symposia and professional meetings.

(d) Scientific publications (such as Naval Research Reviews).

(f) Speeches.

(g) Other special programs.

2. News events likely to be of public interest during 1968 (but are not limited to):

(a) Exhibits at:

(1) American Institute of Aeronautics & Astronautics annual meeting.

(2) State of Science Exposition.

(3) Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers conference.

(4) American Institute of Biological Sciences meeting.

(5) Instrument Society of America conference.

(6) American Association for the Advancement of Science conference.

(7) ONR exhibits during Engineers' Week, Navy Day, Armed Forces Day and at the Pentagon.

(b) Navy Science Cruiser Program:

(1) Approximately 220 youths, both boys and girls, will be selected at regional science fairs to participate in the annual one-week Navy Science Cruise/Tour at the East Coast or West Coast Navy facility.

(2) At the International Science Fair, which in 1968 will be held in Detroit 15–18 May, ten grand winners and ten alternates will be selected to receive offers of summer employment at Navy laboratories. One of this group will also serve as the Navy representative in the Department of Defense delegation which visits the Annual Japanese Science Fair in Tokyo.

(c) Two prototypes of the "Monster Buoy" Ocean Data System, which is designed to collect and transmit oceanographic data over distances of 2,500 miles while moored in deep water unattended for up to one year, will begin operation in 1968 as part of a broad oceanographic survey of the North Central Pacific.

(d) The prototype of an exoskeleton device known as HARDIMAN, which will augment a man's strength and endurance, will be completed in 1968.

(e) ALVIN, the Navy's first deep-diving research at depths down to 6,000 feet. Two new ALVIN-type vehicles will be completed in the latter half of 1968.

(f) "Rotor-Wing"—rotates to provide an aircraft with lift and hover capabilities of a helicopter, then is stopped and fixed in place to convert to high-speed, fixed-wing aircraft—is undergoing exploratory development.

(g) Development of Navy's computer-aided instruction system—computers instruct students both in academic subjects and how to operate and maintain complicated equipment.

(h) Development of frozen blood bank systems in supplementing standard system in combat areas.

(i) Dedication of new Space Science building at Naval Research Laboratory and groundbreaking for new Chemistry Laboratory building in Spring of 1968.

(j) Deep Freeze 1968, the Navy's annual Antarctic operation, involves over 2,500 men of the Navy, Coast Guard, Army and Air Force, plus over a dozen ships and aircraft. The major mission of these forces is to provide logistic support for civilian scientists who are prosecuting more than 60 scientific projects.

(k) SEALAB III is the third of a continuing series of ocean experiments designed to develop methods for men to live in the ocean for extended periods. Success of SEALAB projects will hasten the development of major engineering activities on the continental shelves.

(l) AUTEC, Atlantic Undersea Test and Evaluation Center, is located in the "Tongue of the Ocean" off Andres Island in the Bahamas. Commissioned in February 1967 the Ocean-bottomed instrumentation areas and island-based computer facilities will help the Navy assess effectiveness of sensors and determine ways of more silently operating warships and submarines.

APPENDIX V—OCEANOGRAPHY

1. Exploration and use of the deep oceans has become increasingly practicable and important to national and Free World defense. Various military, political and economic factors tend to merge into a realm of total national interest where traditional dividing lines between strictly civilian and military pursuits may no longer be distinguishable.

(a) The growing involvement of the Navy's oceanographic program with the scientific, educational and industrial communities indicates the need for direct information channels to these areas. Special literature should be made available and questions should be answered promptly.

(b) It should be noted also that Navy and Navy-sponsored oceanographers already produce a considerable amount of scientific and technical literature suitable for publication in academic and institutional periodicals.

2. The Oceanographer's Public Affairs program 1968 will be carried out under his supervision with the cooperation of all Navy Offices, bureaus and activities having a direct interest in oceanography.

(a) The program will put appropriate emphasis on each of the major fields of oceanography, ocean engineering and development and oceanographic operations in support of the Fleet.

(b) Support of the Office of the Chief of Information is available and all important contacts with the national media will be through that Office and the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs).

3. Therefore 1968 public affairs objectives of the Oceanographer of the Navy will include stress on:

(a) The vital importance of oceanography to national defense, particularly in the fields of antisubmarine and undersea warfare.

(b) Social and economic benefits to the United States of the Navy's sharing of oceanographic data and techniques with other government agencies and private industry.

(c) Career opportunities in oceanography and ocean engineering.

(d) The economic opportunities oceanography offers to assist emerging nations in their searches for minerals and food.

APPENDIX VI—YOUTH PROGRAMS

1. Several public service organizations sponsor and direct youth programs of interest to the Navy which merit its attention and support. Commands at every level should seek to insure their success. Some typical organizations and the programs they sponsor are:

(a) The Navy League:

(1) The Navy League Cadet Corps, for boys 12 and 13 years of age, is an indoctrinational program for the U.S. Naval Sea Cadet Corps.

(2) The U.S. Naval Sea Cadet Corps, for boys 14 through 17 years of age, is a Federally chartered corporation jointly sponsored by the Navy Department and the Navy League.

(3) Both Navy League youth programs aim to develop the skills of basic seamanship and the traits of self-reliance, courage and patriotism. Both are committed to Navy training, including the teachings of seapower and naval customs, traditions and usage.

(4) Shipmate is a program designed to interest high-caliber, well-motivated high school students, 12 to 18 years of age, in a naval career, and to acquaint them with the traditions, purposes and role of the Navy as part of our national defense organization.

(b) Boy Scouts of America:

(1) The objectives of the naval program of cooperation with the Boy Scouts of America are:

(a) To familiarize the nation's youth with the objectives, customs and traditions of the Navy and Marine Corps.

(b) To encourage voluntary participation by naval personnel in programs sponsored by the Boy Scouts of America.

(c) Explorer Scouts—boys 15 to 18 years of age. (The Explorer Service will receive the most extensive support, due to the more mature age level of Explorers. Cooperation with the Boy Scouts will best be achieved at the local level. However, the Chief of Information maintains contact with the National Council of the Boy Scouts of America.)

(c) Newspaper Carrier Boys:

(1) the Navy Department also honors the request of newspaper executives to establish tours and host newspaper carrier salesmen at various naval installations. The support provided by the Navy to groups of this nature is not as broad in scope as the support provided to Federally-chartered youth groups and is normally limited to group visits to naval ships and installations.

(2) Newspaper carrier salesmen can also be incorporated into the Navy League Shipmate Program or the Boy Scouts.

(d) Amateur Scientific Groups:

(1) Commanding officers, in dealing with youth science groups, will stress the importance of formal basic scientific training to provide leadership for future technological progress.

(2) Typical forms of cooperation:

(a) Speakers.

(b) Films.

(c) Instructional and informational materials.

(d) Demonstrations, exhibits and displays of military hardware of scientific interest.

(e) Tours, visits to ships and briefings.

(e) Aerospace Education Workshops: (1) The Aerospace Education Workshop Program is designed by teacher-training institutes to give university, college and secondary school educators a comprehensive background in the field of aviation.

APPENDIX VII—NAVAL RESERVE PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMPANIES

1. Naval Reserve Public Affairs Companies (NRPAC) are organized to provide a source of trained public affairs personnel in the event of mobilization and to provide District Commandants and their subordinate commands with public affairs assistance. They also assist the Chief of Information in the implementation of the overall public affairs program of the Navy and Marine Corps which is designed to gain support of the Navy from the American public.

2. To achieve this support, the following procedures will be followed:

(a) Each year a list of public affairs projects will be prepared by CHINFO which will support the Department of the Navy Public Affairs Plan and will be included as a part of that plan. Each NRPAC will submit within 30 days, a plan to accomplish selected projects after they receive the annual plan. NRPAC plans should include specific dates, targets, titles of projects and name of personnel assigned to the project. Plans should be forwarded to the appropriate district commandant and the Chief of Information (OI–420).

(b) Each NRPAC will continue to submit the standard project report (CHINFO 5725–2).

3. Listed below are projects for which support is desirable during calendar year 1968. These projects are intended as examples of the type of support desired from NRPA companies. It is not expected that each company will attempt to accomplish every project. However, it is expected that every company, large and small, will establish and vigorously promote a Navy speaker/seapower presentation program, maintain direct and frequent contact and cooperation with other local Navy commands and Navy-oriented groups, maintain a vigorous recruiting program and pursue a training program which will strengthen the professional qualifications of company members.

(a) Contact local naval activities in respective areas to offer assistance and to assist in publicity for human interest Navy stories about local personnel (re-enlistments, serving aboard ship, assisting in a civic project, awards, returning veterans of Vietnam war.)

(b) Contact Naval District Commandants who maintain Navy films available for public showing. Canvass local civic groups and organizations concerned with welfare and recreation of young men, e.g., PTA, school boards and church groups, with the purpose in mind of selling Navy as a future career for young men. Use films as background. There are loads of them.

(c) Arrange for interviews by local newspapers, radio and TV with personnel returning from Vietnam. Arrange appropriate ceremonies to support and honor these personnel.

(d) Arrange news conferences for visiting Navy VIPs. If schedule permits, suggest they address a local civic group.

(e) Promote flying the American Flag on all national, local holidays and Navy Day.

(f) Assist naval hospitals in exposing the general public to the fact that the serviceman is receiving the best medical care available, but that patients here can use and appreciate receiving personal comfort items such as books, stationery and toilet articles. Sponsor a drive to make the public aware that these men would appreciate visits and help, if physically unable, in writing letters, etc. They may need legal or other help for their families or themselves.

(g) Prepare regular radio shows for broadcast by cooperating stations, for example, a five-minute weekly show about the Navy at a local station.

(h) Visit (by appointment) daily newspapers, radio and TV stations to see firsthand how media operate. Establish closer working ties with the media and identify the NRPAC as the Navy's voice in the community. In communities where the Navy has large installations, identify the NRPAC as an official assisting agency in continuing the flow of the Navy's information to the American public.

(i) Coordinate publicity for or sponsor such touring Navy groups as the Naval Air Cadet Choir, Naval Academy Glee Club, Naval Air Training Command Flag Pageant, Blue Jackets Choir, Blue Angels, Sea Chanters and the Marine Corps Drum and Bugle Corps, etc. The Commandant's public affairs office receives all notices of this type.

(j) Suggest feature story or documentary possibilities to local media on various naval activities. The SEABEES and medical personnel, for instance, often are involved in projects that suggest feature treatment.

(k) Assist in publicizing naval ship launchings and commissionings. These should get more publicity than they get at present.

(l) Sponsor annual "Day in the Navy" for high school journalists at Training Centers or other naval activities in the area.

(m) Establish a definite schedule of meetings with the Commandant or principal naval command in your area. If other than the Commandant, keep him informed.

(n) Have a systematic release of stories to local media, particularly neighborhood papers, about individual reservists who enlist, re-enlist, go on training duty or are promoted. (Large dailies ordinarily won't run this kind of story, but smaller suburban and neighborhood papers often do.)

(o) Establish a local Navy Speaker's Bureau in coordination with the commandant as a systematic means to promote, encourage and coordinate the dissemination of the "Navy's story" throughout the community. Use the Speech Bureau in the Office of Information as a source of material and assistance with speeches. Use the seapower presentation and other command presentations plus films to tell the Navy story.

(p) Promote local Navy Science Day to emphasize the Navy's research and development activities and capabilities. Sponsor an appropriate event (a Science Day dinner for community leaders together with outstanding high school science students). Coordinate Navy Science Day with Office of Naval Research and Director of Navy Laboratories, Office of Naval Material. Get local high school and college professors to judge the science exhibits.

(q) Cooperate with local Navy League, NRA and other Navy/Marine Corps-oriented organizations and newspapers to sponsor newsboys' visits to historic sites, naval station, training centers, ships, etc.

(r) Assist reserve units, including NROS, ROC and NROTC, in charting publicity and community relations programs that will spur recruitment and retention.

(s) Make a continuing, vigorous effort to replace NRPAC personnel lost because of attrition, promotion, transfer, retirement, etc. Further efforts to augment NRPACs through persistent recruiting, especially through the direct commission program for 1655 officers. We must get young talent into the program.

(t) Plan and make field trips to installations for briefings on the latest scientific, technological and military developments as a means to stay abreast of changes, improvements and new techniques. A story has to be known before it can be told. Schedule through the Commandant.

(u) Maintain closer support relationships with the District PAO to promote speed, efficiency, accuracy and coordination of district-wide public affairs efforts.

(v) Organize a program to bring entertainers, politicians, sports figures and other celebrities to naval hospitals.

(w) Have a systematic release program for localized Navy news photography through the unit's Press Officer.

(x) Plan special cruises aboard Navy ships for media representatives to:

(1) Demonstrate air and surface ASW techniques.

(2) Stress Navy's role in scientific and technological research and development.

(3) Show Polaris deterrent.

(y) Nominate top media executives for two yearly trips to Hawaii (15 per trip) on an aircraft carrier and return via Navy air to the West Coast.

(z) News releases to papers and spot announcements to radio stations on reserve enlistment opportunities, aimed mainly at bringing skilled personnel into Reserve Units. The Navy's advanced pay grade program (formerly special rating program) is one example of how a NRPAC can assist individual units in recruiting enlisted personnel with special skills.

(aa) Contact other Reserve Units in area to establish a Public Affairs Liaison Representative to:

(1) Gain a closer working relationship between the other Reserve Units and the NRPAC.

(2) Keep the NRPAC informed about newsworthy projects and events of the Reserve Units.

(3) Coordinate reserve public affairs activities in the area.

(bb) Place Navy display material in airports and other appropriate areas.

(cc) Create professional training workshops for PAOs to teach them the methods of preparing and disseminating news releases, techniques of community relations, and principles and guidelines of Navy public affairs.

(dd) Investigate the local area for museums and other accommodations suitable for exhibiting Navy Combat Art and other exhibits.

(ee) Nominate to CHINFO, through the Commandant, outstanding leaders of the area for the Global Strategy Discussion at the Naval War College, VIP cruises and other special orientation cruises.

(ff) Sponsor practical training for PAOs, JOs, and PH/JOs at local newspapers, radio and TV stations.

(gg) Contact Navy Recruiters in the area, Presidents of Navy League Councils, NRA Chapters, ROA Chapters (Navy Element), CHINFO Branch Officers (L.A.-Chicago-N.Y.) and NRTC units for mutual support and help.

(hh) Help the CHINFO Branch Officers and recruiters to get Navy film series on local TV stations.

(ii) Identify new TV outlets, especially educational, and notify CHINFO Branch Offices and the Commandants for possible placement of Navy educational, training and public information films.

(jj) Assist local Navy-oriented organizations to celebrate Navy Day in appropriate fashion.

(kk) Promote the showing of Navy-oriented films; i.e., the Enterprise story, through local business circles.

(ll) If local radio, TV and newspapers are favorable to Navy news call them up from time to time and tell them how much people appreciate getting the Navy news.

(mm) If the news is devoid of Navy activity, call the media and ask the simple question, "Where is the Navy news today?".

(nn) Promote the playing and singing of the Navy Hymn in local churches.

(oo) Help NRA and Navy League promote Navy Sabbath during Navy Day Week.

(pp) To enhance the Navy educational image, promote:

(1) Naval officers and enlisted men speaking at their high school or college graduation exercises.

(2) Sponsor Honorary Degrees for naval personnel from their respective colleges.

ANNEX B—MARINE CORPS

1. The Marine Corps and its responsibilities in National Defense remain of historic and continuing importance to the public. To this end, the following areas should be noted in 1968: the conflict in Vietnam, covering all areas of Corps involvement; the individual Marine and the factors affecting his morale, welfare and well-being; the training of Marines, officer and enlisted, to include formal schooling as well as physical training; personnel procurement, officer and enlisted, regular and reserve; the Marine Corps Reserve as a ready backup force and delivery of new weapons and equipment.

2. This Annex provides for a public affairs plan in support of, and based on, the mission of the Marine Corps. Its aim is to keep the American public informed concerning:

(a) Marine Corps missions, organization and performance.

(b) Activities of the Marine Corps compatible with military security.

3. Objectives of the Marine Corps public affairs plan are to enlighten the public in the:

(a) Understanding of the Marine Corps' role as an integral part of the Nation's "Amphibious Force-in-Readiness", and the Navy/Marine Corps Team.

(b) Understanding of the balanced fleet concept and the role of Fleet Marine Forces in seapower.

(c) Understanding of the Marine Corps' special capabilities for limited war.

(d) Awareness of the capabilities of the Marine Corps' integrated airground team.

(e) Recognition of the Marine Corps' emphasis on the development of physical fitness.

(f) Acceptance of the Marine Corps for career service.

(g) Support of a strong Marine Corps Reserve.

4. The following are opportunities to be emphasized during the year:

(a) The Marine Corps' role in Vietnam.

(b) The individual Marine and the factors affecting his morale, welfare and well-being.

(c) The training of Marines, officer and enlisted, to include military education, citizenship and moral leadership as well as physical training.

(d) The total personnel procurement effort, officer and enlisted, regular and reserve.

(e) The Marine Corps Reserve as the Corps' ready backup force.

(f) The delivery of new weapons and equipment.

(g) The 25th Anniversary of Women Marines; continuous, unbroken service since February 1943.

(h) Development and implementation of Command, Control and Management systems within the Marine Corps.

(i) The Marine Corps Youth Physical Fitness Program; primarily directed at high school males, with the goal of raising the general level of physical fitness of the Nation's youth.

5. Methods of communicating with the public will include:

(a) Speakers, other public appearances and pronouncements, news conferences and personal interviews.

(b) News releases, filmed, taped and written, for use by radio, television, magazine and house organs, as well as newspapers.

(c) Community relations programs at all levels.

(d) Support to veterans and service-oriented civilian organizations.

(e) Appearances of musical units and troop units at appropriate occasions in the civilian community.

(f) A Command Visit Program for prominent civilians and media representatives to observe the Marine Corps in action.

(g) Development and exploitation of a Combat Art Program.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In order to gain the understanding and support of American citizens of the need for modern ships, aircraft, and equipment the Navy, in fiscal year 1969, maintained a public relations apparatus consisting of a full-time staff of 1,086, plus 1,600 to 1,800 more working at it part time on ships and in other installations. The Navy's identifiable costs last year for public relations were $9,901,000.

I ask unanimous consent that a report relating to the staff and cost of the Navy's public affairs program be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. What is the basic overall cost of these public affairs programs? Please include within that your estimate of personnel as well as operations costs.

The only information available Navy-wide for public affairs programs is for those in the public information and community relations fields. (I.e. activity involving preparation of materials for release to the public via the mass communication news media and activity involving direct contact with the public via response to individual inquiries about Navy subjects, and response to private and civic group requests for exhibits, speakers, etc.) (Internal relations programs—passing the word within the Navy—are so integrated with normal command and administrative functions that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible to separate). Information in the table below is based on a Navy-wide survey made in November–December 1968. [These figures also include personnel costs for military and civilian personnel attached to the Office of Information, Navy Department who are involved in the execution, supervision and planning of these programs.]

Navy-wide personnel and other costs of public information and community relations activities conducted incident to Navy public affairs programs.

[In thousands of dollars]

	Military pay	Civilian pay	Other costs	Total costs
Fiscal year 1966	3,818	1,984	1,062	7,864
Fiscal year 1967	5,020	2,576	1,397	8,993
Fiscal year 1968	5,227	2,941	1,037	9,205

2. Please estimate the number of officers, enlisted men and civilians, both full and part-time, who are part of the Navy's public affairs program.

The table below reports personnel involved full-time in the programs costed in paragraph 1. (i.e. public information and community relations) [This includes the numbers of CHINFO personnel involved as noted for paragraph 1.] On board practically all ships in the Navy, the duties of public affairs officer are assigned to one officer as a collateral duty. Usually, an extremely small percentage of his time is spent on this collateral duty. Any paperwork generated by him would be handled by a ship's yeoman in the course of his regular duty as time permits. Based on the number of ships in the Navy, this would mean on the order of 800–900 officers and a similar number of enlisted men, primarily yeomen, engaged part time (to a very small degree) in these programs.

3. With regard to the Office of Information, please supply information about the following:

(a) How many officers, enlisted men and civilians are working for the Office of Information in Washington? Elsewhere?

The Office of Information consists of the departmental staff in the Pentagon plus field activities as follows:

U.S. Navy/Marine Corps Exhibit Center Washington Navy Yard, Washington, D.C.

Fleet Home Town News Center/High School News Service Great Lakes, Illinois.

Public Affairs Office East Coast New York City.

Public Affairs Office Mid-West Chicago, Illinois.

Note: As indicated in the response to question No. 1, full costs for public affairs activities Navy-wide are not available. Only costs for public information and community relations activities were obtained in the 1968 survey referred to. This table, on the other hand, shows total costs for operation of the Office of Information (departmental) and its associated field activities.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I emphasize that these figures are based upon the figures supplied to the committee by the Pentagon itself. These are not my estimates. These are based upon as solid facts as we can get. Overall direction of the campaign is through the Navy's Office of Information, manned by a Washington staff of 147, operating with a budget of $1,745,000. Parkinson's Law has found fertile ground in the Navy's public affairs program; the overall budget has gone up to 25 percent in the last 3 years; and the Washington operation is up 57 percent in staff and 65 percent in cost. These figures are only for programs aimed at the public. They do not include the costs of the Navy's internal information and education programs.

In addition to this public affairs effort, the Navy message is spread by 31 Naval Reserve Public Affairs companies consisting of 409 officers and 6 enlisted men, and located throughout the country. Each company must submit an annual project plan to the Navy's Chief of Information detailing the ways it will sell the Navy locally in the coming year.

I ask unanimous consent that the Annual Plan for the Chicago Naval Reserve Public Affairs Company be printed in the RECORD a this point.

There being no objection, the annual plan was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANNUAL PLAN FOR CHICAGO NAVAL RESERVE PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMPANY

From: Commanding Officer, NRPAC 9–2, Chicago.
To: Chief of Information, Navy Department.
Via: Commandant, Ninth Naval District.
Subject: Annual Public Affairs Plan.
Reference: SECNAV Note, 5720.
cc: Commander, Group Command 9–2, Chicago.
Commander, Naval Reserve Training, Omaha, Nebraska.

1. Background: In accordance with the reference cited, the following plan is submitted by NRPAC 9–2. It details this unit's activities which are targeted to help implement the overall Navy public affairs plan for fiscal year 1969. Many of the listed projects and activities have been completed or are currently in process. The combined plan is designed to meet Navy and Naval Reserve public affairs goals nationally and locally.

2. Purpose: This plan is not intended as a precise operating schedule. As with most public affairs plans which span a year's activities, it will serve as a general guideline with appropriate objectives, and plans to meet these objectives. However, flexibility must be maintained to take advantage of unforeseen opportunities that will arise as the year progresses. Therefore, this plan outlines the types of activities that will be used to reach the objectives and indicates the communications tools to be applied to specific goals.

3. Organization: NRPAC 9–2 is the largest Navy Reserve Public Affairs unit, and, as such, it is uniquely suited through size, geographical location and membership background to carry out Navy-oriented public affairs activities in the fertile and important midwest area.

4. Public Affairs Plan:

a. Objectives:

1. Increase awareness of need for keeping a powerful Navy, both for wartime and peaceful purposes.

2. Communicate traditions, opportunities and desirability of Navy career, active or reserve, to appropriate audiences.

3. Broaden the concept of the carrier strike force.

4. Increase support for expansion of nuclear fleet.

5. Publicize Navy-Marine Corps efforts in Viet Nam.

6. Increase awareness of active and reserve Navy forces in the Chicago area.

b. Audiences:

1. The general public within a 500 mile radius of Chicago.

2. The business community, and other civic, government and religious leaders including Navy League.

3. Young men and women of high school age, and above as potential active and reserve recruits.

4. Media representatives.

5. Active duty Navy and other military personnel.

6. Active and retired reservists, Navy and other services.

c. Media: It is the plan of NRPAC 9–2 to use every available communications medium to bring the story of the Navy and Navy reserve to the targeted audiences. This includes: print media, newspapers, trade magazines, Sunday supplements; direct mail; personal contact; broadcast, TV and radio; advertising; brochures; outdoor billboards and electronic devices; and others.

d. Projects and activities:

Following is a list of projects and areas of activity that will be (or are being) employed to meet the objectives of this program:

1. Expanded unit speaker's bureau from six to 20 people with the goal of giving at least 60 speeches before civic, fraternal, business, education and other groups during the current fiscal year.

2. Improve drill schedule to include more media and top Navy personnel as speakers.

3. Increase number of 9–2 personnel taking correspondence courses by 50 per cent during the fiscal year.

4. Increase number of 9–2 personnel going on ACDUTRA by 20 percent.

5. Establish special committee to promote and publicize 9–2 activities and personnel.

6. Appoint special Viet Nam officer within unit and provide committee to keep unit abreast of current Navy activities in Viet Nam. Publicize returning veterans of the Navy through "Heroes of Khe San" project.

7. Recruit 10 additional members for 9–2 during current year.

8. Increase the showing of Navy films in Chicago area by 20 per cent.

9. Produce special Navy film clip on Chicagoans who as Navy Reservists are "Twice a Citizen."

10. Increase number of Navy-oriented VIP visits to Chicago area that will produce media interests. Publicize each, including visits from VADM Martin, RADM Geis, etc.

11. Publicize the Navy/Air Force Football game, related visiting dignitaries, midshipmen and Naval Academy Choir through special project with City of Chicago.

12. Publicize Navy Day and Navy Sabbath by arranging for Navy Hymn to be sung in 4,000 area churches and through promotion of open houses.

13. Increase 9-2 attendance at annual NRPAC seminar to be held at GLAKES November 2–3.

14. Establish special project to improve use of Navy display materials in Chicago area. Set up four showings of Navy displays, in Chicago during year. Arrange for permanent display of 9–2 accumulated trophies in local bank.

15. Establish special project in conjunction with Chicago Tribune to give special attention and award to those people and organizations displaying American flag.

16. Establish project to provide entertainment personalities, books, VIP visits and other items to veterans in area Navy hospitals.

17. Complete at least one "Day In The Navy" project to take area high school and college editors, especially from minority group schools, to local Navy facilities. Objective is to gain publicity in area media and school media.

18. Produce 13-week Navy radio show in conjunction with NAS Glenview for WGN Radio, Chicago.

19. Obtain publicity on local Navy and Naval Reserve facilities, such as departure of USS SILVERSIDES (reserve submarine), Naval armory, local reserve units, Navy ball, Northwestern ROTC Ball, Marine Corps Ball, Desron in area.

20. Publicize local entries in Navy Science Day.

21. Gain publicity for 9–2 members in company house organs.

22. Suggest 10 candidates from area for SECNAV guest cruise program.

23. Set up and publicize cruise by local media representatives (member of Chicago Press Club) on Navy ships in Great Lakes.

24. Establish semi-monthly 9–2 newsletter ("The Captain Speaking") to improve communications, interest and morale within unit.

25. Set up project committee to arrange Lake Michigan cruise for members and families of 9–2. Publicize cruise.

26. Establish project and provide people for active duty for training to help organize, write and publish a special Naval Academy supplement for distribution through Chicago Sun-Times.

27. Set up permanent Feature Articles Officer in 9–2 to work on ideas for area trade, consumer, supplemental and other publications to publicize area Navy Reservists and their activities.

28. Work with other local commands to set up standard neighborhood release procedure for each unit's personnel as they go on ACDUTRA, get promoted and so forth.

29. Sponsor special program to take local newsboys aboard Navy facilities for a visit. Publicize visit.

30. Increase unit visits to local military and media facilities. (Three drills to each type of facility during year.)

31. Establish project based on search for sunken German Submarine in Lake Michigan to publicize Great Lakes Navy ships.

32. Provide aid, assistance and ideas for planning program to improve the Navy image nationwide. (National Navy League request).

33. Promote and publicize need for improved merchant marine fleet. Also produce special slide presentation telling this story in economic terms adding in the value of seapower.

34. Establish project to encourage area Reserve officers and men to speak at high school or college graduation exercises and promote honorary degrees for area Navy and Marine personnel.

35. Reactivate project to bring active duty Navy public affairs officers to Chicago area for seminar on how professional civilian communications organizations operate, how planning and market research is done.

36. Set up project to increase visits of general public and special groups to special Navy exhibit in Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry.

37. Publicize public affairs direct commission program to encourage greater participation in reserve by communicators, especially members of minority groups.

38. Establish project to create special Great Lakes Training center displays for Midway and O'Hare airports with cooperation from TDI.

39. Suggest five area media representatives for media cruise to Hawaii.

40. Encourage unit members to attend next Navy Speaker's Seminar, the first one of which was attended this year by CO, NRPAC 9–2.

41. Set up project to aid "Hands Across The Sea" program by providing six tons of chewing gum from The Wrigley Company for the Navy to distribute in Spanish speaking countries. Publicize movement and distribution of gum.

42. Promote sale and distribution of book "John F. Kennedy; Man of the Sea" through consumer media, within the Navy and other outlets.

Other project opportunities will no doubt arise in the course of implementing the above plan. These projects will be factored into the plan as appropriate.

Very respectfully submitted,

Cdr. A. L. CONRAD,
USNR–R, Commanding Officer,
NRPAC 9–2, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What does the Navy buy with the nearly $10 million it spends to persuade the public? Let me list a few examples of last year's effort:

One thousand one hundred and thirty-six news releases prepared by the Office of Information's News Branch;

Thirty-nine thousand photos distributed to news media;

Forty-nine news film releases prepared for TV use, on subjects ranging from the appearance of Russian trawlers off Virginia to the retirement of a Navy seaplane;

Fifty-five 1-minute TV "news featurettes" on subjects such as civic action in Vietnam and joint naval operations in Latin America;

Navy assistance in production of about 12 commercial films a year;

Assistance in producing some 100 noncommercial films, primarily for Navy contractors;

Operated a speakers bureau of top civilian and military personnel which filled 251 speaking engagements across the country;

At this point I ask unanimous consent that the list of speeches made by senior Navy officials in fiscal year 1969 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speeches were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT III

SENIOR SPEAKERS OF THE NAVY PROVIDED BY NAVY DEPARTMENT SPEECH BUREAU, JULY 1968 THROUGH JULY 1969, FISCAL YEAR 1969

The Office of Information does not "program" Navy speakers. Rather, speakers are provided in response to specific requests made to or referred to the Office. The attached list reflects speaking engagements filled by Navy Flag Officers and Senior Civilian Officials of the Navy in response to such requests. This list is not all inclusive, Navy-wide, but only for those speaking engagements coordinated through the Navy Department Speech Bureau.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Lastly:

Publication of a monthly magazine, "Direction", for Navy public affairs officers, and periodic publication of three items for Navy ghost writers and speakers—"Navy Speakers Guide", "Outstanding Navy Speeches", and "Quotable Navy Quotes."

The list could go on but I wish to discuss in more detail two programs which, I think, illustrate the pervasiveness of the Navy's efforts to win friends and influence in the news media and the public. Twice a year the Navy invites a group of newsmen to spend a few days aboard ship, watching their Navy in action. One of the responsibilities assigned to the 31 Naval Reserve Public Affairs companies, according to an instruction issued last year by the Secretary of the Navy, is to "Nominate top media executives for two yearly trips to Hawaii (15 per trip) on an aircraft carrier and return via Navy air to the West Coast." The manner of selecting the local newsmen was made plain in this item from the annual public affairs plan for the Sioux City, Iowa, Reserve company which called for: Contact with media personnel and selection of those most closely cooperating." "Cooperating" obviously means thumping the Navy's tub. Last year the Navy Secretary's instructions to local Reserve public affairs companies told them:

If the news is devoid of Navy activity, call the media and ask the simple question, "Where is the Navy news today?"

But the news media were not alone in receiving the Navy's favors. In the last 2 years, 188 VIP's from throughout the country have enjoyed the Navy's hospitality on 13 cruises, most of them destined for Hawaii. The occupations listed for the guests ranged from sheep rancher, to steel magnate, to labor leader. One guest, Bertrand Harding, then director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, apparently liked his September 1968 trip to Hawaii on the U.S.S. Coral Sea so much he went back again in March of this year aboard another aircraft carrier. I think it would be safe to assume that the guests received a thorough exposure to the Navy's power potential—and requirements—en route to and at Pearl Harbor under the most favorable circumstances.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to continue for an additional 10 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in a somewhat similar public relations category, the Navy each year invites a varied list of civilians to attend a global strategy discussion at the Naval War College. Again, as in the case of news media and VIP cruises, Naval Reserve Public Affairs companies are expected to nominate for invitation "outstanding leaders of the area." The list for the 1968 meeting is a varied one, ranging from the board chairman of Washington's Woodward and Lothrop department store to the president of the Defense Department-financed Hudson Institute. But the flavor of the invitation list is distinctly that of a board meeting of the military-industrial complex. Some of the defense contractors represented were: Raytheon, Litton Industries, Curtis-Wright, North American Rockwell, Sikorsky, Lockheed, Bendix, Sperry Rand, General Electric, Aerojet-General Western Electric, Martin Marietta, and so on. Thus, I imagine that the Navy War College's message on the importance of seapower falls on somewhat sympathetic ears.

I ask unanimous consent that the lists of guests of the Navy and participants in the global strategy discussion be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Each of the armed services maintains a vast inventory of motion pictures for internal training purposes—and for indoctrinating the public on the merits of their particular service. The Navy's catalog of films available for public use lists some 850 subjects—ranging from "Why Vietnam," a historically false, blatant piece of propaganda in support of a discredited policy, to "Hand Dishwashing and General Scullery Practices." Last year, 12 new films, produced at a cost of $294,000, were released to the public. The narrators of some of the films listed are the top stars of television and the movies—Chet Huntley, Henry Fonda, Jack Webb, Glenn Ford, Walter Cronkite, and others.

I ask unanimous consent that the lists of Navy films available to the public be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the lists were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINFO INSTRUCTION 5728.2B

From: Chief of Information
To: All Ships and Stations (less Marine Corps field addressees not having Navy personnel attached)
Subject: Navy films cleared for public and television showings; revised listing of Enclosure: (1) List of films cleared for public and television showings
(2) Synopsis of films of general public interest
(3) List of Naval Districts

1. Purpose. To provide an up-to-date list of Navy films cleared for public and television showings, and to present a list of films considered suitable for general public and television showings. It is the purpose of this Instruction to assist local naval film distribution centers, public affairs offices, and recruiting activities to prepare film catalogues which best suit their individual requirements.

2. Cancellation. This instruction cancels and supersedes CHINFO Instruction 5728.2A of 27 September 1967.

3. Definition of terms and symbols:

a. Public Showings: Film screening before any groups other than audiences solely consisting of U.S. military personnel, U.S. Government employees, or U.S. Government contractors or agents with a need to know.

b. Television Showings: Public service film screenings on television.

c. Navy Film Serial Numbers are used to identify all films distributed within the Navy, regardless of their source. For example, in the serial number MN–1000C:

(1) "M" identifies the film as a motion picture. (An "F" would show that it is a filmagraph, a film made by photographing still pictures, drawings, and paintings; "K" would show that it is a kinescope motion picture.)

(2) "N" indicates the film was produced by the Navy, or under a Navy contract; other source abbreviations include "A" for Army, "C" for commercial, "D" for Department of Defense, "G" for other Government agencies, and "H" for Marine Corps.

(3) "1000" is the sequential number assigned to the film by the Naval Air Systems Command.

(4) "C" indicates that the film is part of a series on the same subject, and is the third film in that series.

4. Special Film Categories:

a. Victory at Sea. This series of 26 half-hour films (MN–7308 A–Z) is not cleared for public or television showings because of a special agreement made with the National Broadcasting Company at the time the series was produced. However, NBC has given permission for the Navy to show this series internally and before school groups only.

b. Medical Films. Requests for medical films not shown in the enclosures (1) and (2) should be referred to the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery (Code 3166).

c. Training Films. All training films cleared for public showing are included in enclosures (1) and (2).

d. General Interest and Information Films. All Navy information, recruiting, and general interest films cleared for public release are listed in enclosures (1) and (2). Those not cleared for television will have "(No TV)" in the description line.

e. Films of Professional Interest. Films listed with "(Professional use only)" following their descriptions are cleared for showing before professional groups only and are not to be shown to the general public.

5. Instructions for Obtaining Films:

a. Films listed in enclosures (1) and (2) may be obtained on a limited free-loan basis from the nearest Naval district Public Affairs Office (see enclosure (3)).

b. Films cleared for sale may be purchased from the DuArt Film Laboratories, Inc., 245 West 55th Street, New York, New York 10019. Requests should be forwarded to the Chief of Information for approval.

Stocked: Supply and Fiscal Depart. (Code 514.32), Naval Station, Washington, D.C.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, at least 240 prints of each films, the number depending on public demand, are readily available for public use at naval offices throughout the country. All Navy units are expected to promote the public showing of Navy films. "Experience has shown," the Navy stated, "that many films in the Naval District film libraries are in constant demand by private citizens and civilian organizations. Additionally, most television stations served by the three branch offices regularly schedule Navy information films in their public service spots." Two recent Navy films on the drug problem, "LSD," and "Trip to Nowhere" have been seen by 75 million people, the Navy estimated.

I question whether it is a proper function of the armed services to prepare and promote public circulation of films on the drug problem, or on the foreign policy of this country. I thought that public information on the drug problem was a responsibility of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Department of Justice. And that, if the public was to be indoctrinated on foreign policy issues at all, the Department of State was the proper agency to do it.

Mr. President, I do not want my remarks to be construed as condemnation of the personnel of the Navy Department who plan and carry out these programs to mold public attitudes to the Navy point of view. They are only doing what they are told to do and what is to be expected of all supporters of an organization, plan, or idea, commanding ample financial resources and unrestrained by superior authority. It should come as no surprise to Congress that the public affairs budget for the Department of Defense has gone up 1,000 percent in the 10 years since the congressional limitation on public relations spending was dropped. Parkinson's law operates most effectively in a vacuum. The Navy public affairs organization has only been doing what comes naturally—trying to win public support for the Navy which, in turn, will be reflected in congressional support for the "modern ships, aircraft, and equipment" referred to in the Secretary of the Navy's 1969 public affairs plan.

But there is something basically unwise and undemocratic about a system which taxes the public to finance a propaganda campaign aimed at persuading the same taxpayers that they must spend more tax dollars to subvert their independent judgment. I am reminded of W. C. Fields' admonition: "Never give a sucker an even break." With the three services and the Department of Defense, and their allies in industry, academia, and labor, all working at convincing the taxpayer that he must shell out more for military purposes, John Q. Public does not stand a chance—unless his representatives in Congress bring the public relations apparatus under control. Only Congress can give the public an even break. I hope it will take steps to do so this session.

Mr. President, this concludes my second statement on this subject. Thursday, I will discuss the public relations activities of the Air Force.

EXTENSION OF PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous consent agreement, the time for the transaction of routine morning business has expired.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended by an additional 20 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time for the transaction of routine morning business will be extended, by unanimous consent, for an additional 20 minutes.

ABOMINABLE ATROCITY AT MY LAI

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, it is evident to me that Lt. Col. Reid Kennedy, who has been designated by the commanding officer at Fort Benning, Ga., to serve as military judge in the court martial of 1st Lt. William L. Calley, Jr., in his so-called ruling threatening former GI's who were in our Armed Forces in Vietnam at the time of the slaughter of hundreds of women, children, babies, and old men at My Lai is acting much too big for his britches.

It is true that he is a lieutenant colonel in our Armed Forces. In my opinion, that is a high rank. He is deserving of my respect. It happens that I have served as a private in our Army in the time of war. Also, in March of 1946 following 37 months service, most of that time in North Africa and Italy, I was discharged as a lieutenant colonel. In 1943 while with the 5th Army in Naples directly following the day of liberation, October 1, 1943, I served as the sole trial judge presiding over numerous cases wherein Italian civilians were charged with intercepting electricity from the Fifth Army. I also heard a number of cases involving various offenses from military curfew violations to serious crimes. Also, later in Rome and in the Anzio beachhead I served as one of three military judges presiding over spy cases.

No one, but no one, Mr. President, termed me a judge because of this service. Yet, in this Chamber and in the newspapers time and again we read of some pronouncement of Lieutenant Colonel Kennedy at Fort Benning referring to him as Judge Kennedy. For example, this so-called judge who evidently is ignorant of the criminal laws of our country has directed that officials of news media must not talk with and therefore must not quote witnesses who at the time of the My Lai massacre were in the Army and witnessed the murders or participated in them. "Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed that he is grown so great?" This lieutenant colonel even issued a statement, "I am confident you will find that witnesses will not be contacted further by any responsible news agency."

This so-called judge is only a military court judge in the two separate murder cases wherein Lt. William L. Calley, Jr., will be tried by court martial.

Mr. President, Paul Meadlo, a native of my neighboring State, Indiana, was a GI who was present as a member of the platoon under the command of Lieutenant Calley and of the company commanded by Capt. Ernest Medina. Paul Meadlo has been honorably discharged from our Armed Forces. He is a civilian. He is back home in Indiana with his wife. They have two little children now. Paul Meadlo states that after talking with his wife and with his father he felt he had to purge his mind of the horror he had participated in. He has made a complete and frank statement of the facts he witnessed at the time some hundreds of Vietnamese old men, women, children, and babies living in the hamlet of Mylai were methodically murdered.

Regardless of what may be stated by anyone in this Chamber or in the other body or by this military judge at Fort Benning, who may be an execellent lieutenant colonel but appears to be a poor lawyer, I know as he should know that he has no authority whatever over Paul Meadlo or any of the other men who were in the Army at the time of the massacre but who are now out of the Army.

Mr. President, I have served, as I stated, as a military judge in spy and other cases in World War II. The fact is that before World War II in private life I was chief criminal prosecuting attorney of Cuyahoga County, Ohio. As such I prosecuted over the years many, many felony cases including more than 100 homicide cases. Then, as a trial lawyer following World War II, I have defended many men and women charged with first degree murder and other crimes. Incidentally, Mr. President, I have been president of two bar associations.

I know that the United States has no extradition treaty with the Government of South Vietnam. I know that Paul Meadlo and other former GI's now in civilian life in our country not only cannot be extradited to Vietnam and placed on trial for murder, but they cannot be placed on trial in the United States for murder or any other offense relating to the horrible murderous atrocities perpetrated by our officers and soldiers at Mylai as the venue of the crime was in South Vietnam. This so-called judge who is a lieutenant colonel at Fort Benning is too big for his britches. He has no authority whatever over news media nor over former GI's who are now civilians. He has the effrontery to make a claim that he could exercise jurisdiction and try civilians. Of course, that is absurd. Were he to take any action of this sort, any U.S. judge of the district where the former GI lived would certainly enjoin this lieutenant colonel and put him in his proper place immediately upon the request of the lawyer representing the former GI.

Ronald Haeberle, of Cleveland, Ohio, then a sergeant, and an Army public information staff member attached to C Company, 1st Battalion, 20th Infantry Regiment, 11th Light Infantry Brigade, was with the troops at Mylai. With his own color camera and with the camera provided by the Army he took numerous pictures of this atrocity. Ronald Haeberle, a fine young man, is now an industrial supervisor for a company in my home city, Cleveland. Before accepting this important position he was drafted in 1966 at a time when he was completing his third year at Ohio University. He has since graduated from that university. His assignment in Vietnam was as a combat photographer. He went on numerous combat missions. He states that what he saw in the little village of Mylai on March 16, 1968, was forever imprinted on his memory. No doubt this lieutenant colonel who some of our colleagues have tried to dignify by terming him judge is aggravated because Ronald Haeberle stated:

> I intend to tell my story because there is a greater truth here which must be told.

The pictures he took of GI's who had the hamlet known as Mylai surrounded were sickening to Secretary of the Army Resor and to members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, many of whom are combat veterans who saw the slides and listened to the testimony of Secretary of the Army Resor.

In his description of this horrible atrocity Ronald Haeberle has stated:

> There was a little boy walking toward us in a daze. He'd been shot in the arm and leg. He wasn't crying or making any noise. The GI fired three shots into the child. The first knocked him back, the second shot lifted him into the air. The third shot put him down and the body fluids came out. The GI simply . . . walked away.

Vernardo Simpson, another former GI, now a civilian, who was present at the massacre, stated:

> We went out that morning and our platoon was the second platoon in. We had orders to search and destroy everything and we came upon the huts and if there was anything in there, well, we was to destroy it and everything. As I came up there was a woman, a man and a child, running away toward the huts, So I told them to stop in their language and everything, and then they didn't, and I had orders to shoot them down and I did this. I shot them, the lady and the little boy. The little boy was about 2 years old. I was following a direct order and if I didn't do this, with that order, when I get back, I could stand court martial for not following a direct order. Afterward our platoon sergeant told us not to mention this thing, what went on and everything. That was all. I guess he had orders from somewhere else.

Charles Gruver, a 24-year-old former GI recently honorably discharged from the Army, stated:

> Everything and everybody was wiped out . . . men, women . . . children . . . Only the chickens were left alive . . . We'd never been ordered to wipe out everybody before. Most of the guys didn't dig it at all. When it was all over, they were almost sick.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have no objection, provided the morning hour is extended by that time because I also have a statement to make.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I shall not take more than 2 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be extended by 3 additional minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the period for the transaction of routine morning business will be extended by 3 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, Charles Gruver said that just before the attack was launched, he heard a single pistol shot behind a tree and went over to investigate. He reported:

> A guy had deliberately shot himself in the foot.
> He told me he just couldn't take it—the attack on the village. He said, "I gotta get out. I can't stand this."

Mr. President, I saw a picture of the incident. That young veteran from Tulsa, Okla., is now in civilian life. He is no longer in the armed services. Let this so-called judge try to shut him up or try to arrest him and there will be some lawyer from Oklahoma before a Federal judge there, and they will stop this arrogant fellow from Fort Benning who does not understand the law although he is to be a trial officer in a court-martial.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article entitled "Tulsa Veteran Recalls Song My."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TULSA VETERAN RECALLS SONG MY

TULSA, OKLA.—"Everything and everybody was wiped out . . . men, women . . . children . . . Only the chickens were left alive."

Thus did an Oklahoma Vietnam veteran describe in an interview yesterday the alleged massacre at the Vietnamese village of Song My on March 16, 1968.

Charles Gruver, 24, of Tulsa, said his outfit, C Company, 20th Infantry Regiment, was told the village was a Viet Cong stronghold and was ordered to destroy it completely.

The Army has charged 1st Lt. William L. Calley Jr., 26, of Waynesville, N.C., with "the premeditated murder of approximately 100 Vietnamese civilians."

"We'd never been ordered to wipe out everybody before," he said. "Most of the guys didn't dig it at all. When it was all over, they were almost sick."

"In the last week or so we'd lost about half our company to snipers and mine fields, and the guys were really fired up when we started the attack. As we entered, we drew fire from some of the huts, and then a lot of the guys sort of went crazy."

Gruver was a private first class and carried an M79 grenade launcher.

"I walked through the village after it was all over . . . all around were bodies of women and children, all shot up."

Gruver said that just before the attack was launched, he heard a single pistol shot behind a tree and went over to investigate.

"A guy had deliberately shot himself in the foot," he said.

"He told me he just couldn't take it—the attack on the village. He said, 'I gotta get out. I can't stand this.'"

Gruver said there was no doubt in his mind that the village was a stronghold of units of the North Vietnamese regular army.

"We confiscated several weapons and took a few prisoners," he said, "and later they found an underground military hospital in the village."

The prisoners were the only persons left alive in the village, he stated.

Gruver said Lt. Calley was intensely disliked by the men because he "did a few unnecessary things."

He said he doubted that Lt. Calley would be prosecuted in the case. "They can't blame him for the whole thing. He got our orders from Capt. Ernest Medina, the company commander."

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, this Lt. Col. Reid Kennedy should read the sixth amendment to the Constitution of our country and then cool off a whole lot. Amendment VI provides:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

This lieutenant colonel may be ignorant of the fact that the United States has no extradition treaty whatever with the government of South Vietnam. Furthermore, he should know there is no real judge, let alone the law officer in a court martial, who can overrule the guarantees given to Americans in the fifth amendment of our Constitution which provides that:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces . . . when in actual service in time of War.

CREEPING EXPROPRIATION

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in the past several months many of us here in the Senate have been shocked and deeply concerned over the highhanded methods of our neighbors to the South in expropriating U.S. property located in their countries. Much has been written about the expropriation of U.S. businesses located in Bolivia and Peru. Today, however, I would like to advise the Senate of the little-known and little-publicized actions of our closest neighbor, the Republic of Mexico, in its dealings with American sulfur interests located in that country. Mexico, unlike its South American neighbors, has not marched in and publicly taken over American property. Mexico's approach is much more subtle but just as devastating to American interests and could be characterized as "creeping expropriation."

A little more than 4 years ago, I made a speech on the floor of the Senate and recounted to this body certain facts about what the Mexican Government was doing to an American company, Gulf Sulphur Corp., in regard to its operations in Mexico. At that time the Mexican Government was using its power to so control the exportation of sulfur as to effectively make it infeasible for them to continue their sulfur operations there. The apparent reason for this action was to force Gulf Sulphur and another American company, Pan American Sulphur, out of business in Mexico. Possibly as a result of my speech the Mexican Government relaxed its export quota system and the American companies continued in business. However, since that time, there have been continued attempts on the part of the Mexican Government to Mexicanize sulfur operations under the guise of protecting natural resources. I, of course, can understand any country's desire to protect its resources, but it should not be done at the expense of American companies who have expended millions of dollars in the development of these resources.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as a result of substantial and illegal pressures by the Mexican Government which began early this year, Gulf Sulphur, which is now Gulf Resources and Chemical Corp., was forced to go along with this Mexicanization and after long and expensive negotiations arranged for a sale of its Mexican subsidiary to Mexican nationals for approximately $24,000,000. According to what Gulf Resources had been led to believe this was exactly what the Mexican Government desired. In fact, the Mexican Government on several occasions has expressed its approval of the sale. Now we are told that the Government of Mexico is not satisfied and has refused to approve the sale. There appears to be no valid reason for this attitude of the Mexican Government other than the fact that it wants Gulf Resources out of Mexico and does not want it to receive fair compensation for the properties which it leaves there. In other words, we have here an attempt to confiscate property without direct intervention as the following facts will clearly show.

About 2 years ago, Gulf Resources' largest competitor in Mexico, Pan American Sulphur, was Mexicanized. Sitting on the board of that new Mexican company are high-ranking officials of the Mexican Government, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Patriminio. These people know that if the Mexican Government can prevent a sale by Gulf Resources at this time, the price will drop and its Mexican operations can be Mexicanized for a price far less than their true value. At that time, the Mexican Government can sit back and say, "We did not expropriate; we did not confiscate; we bought the company. We are not like Peru and Bolivia."

By doing business this way Mexico may feel that the United States will continue to look upon it as a "good" neighbor. However, the situation which I have just described does not bear out this facade and it is high time that our Government stops sitting back and allowing those countries which we have financially assisted in our trade and aid policies to expropriate American properties, irrespective of whether that expropriation is done by force of arms or by the subtle method of refusing to negotiate in good faith.

As in 1964, I intend to inquire of the State Department whether this neoconfiscation to which I have referred comes within the Hickenlooper amendment. Also, as I stated then on the floor of the Senate, I intend to take whatever action necessary to demonstrate that people who engage in this kind of irresponsible conduct will have reason to regret it. This includes the use of my best efforts as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee to insure that those nations that confiscate our investments will not sell the United States sugar at premium prices. We should and must be able to make certain that Americans who have made good-faith investments based upon the encouragement of their own Government and the recipient nation will not have their investments stolen directly or indirectly.

Mr. President, along this line and in support of my argument, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on November 13, 1969, and December 1, 1969.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Nov. 13, 1969]

GULF RESOURCES SAYS MEXICO IS ATTEMPTING TO GRAB PROPERTIES—EXECUTIVE CONTENDS AUTHORITIES ARE BLOCKING CONCERN'S EFFORTS TO SELL ITS SULPHUR SUBSIDIARY

HOUSTON—Gulf Resources & Chemical Corp. charged that the Mexican government is attempting to confiscate the company's sulphur properties in Mexico.

Robert H. Allen, Gulf Resources president, told Houston financial analysts that Mexican authorities are blocking all efforts of the company to sell its sulphur subsidiary and that if continued restrictions are imposed on the sulphur operations, Gulf Resources will seek redress in Mexico's courts.

The company previously agreed to sell its Mexican sulphur operations to a Mexican corporation. Inversiones Azufreras S.A.

Despite repeated attempts, Gulf Resources has had "practically no communication with the Mexican government" for more than nine months, Mr. Allen said, adding: "There are no indications now that the Mexican government intends to permit us to close the sale of our properties there, and rather than Mexicanization there are now indications that what amounts to confiscation is now being considered."

MARKETING POSTURE DESTROYED

Because of pressures and restrictions previously imposed on the sulphur unit, Mr. Allen continued, "Our marketing posture in the sulphur market has been destroyed. We've lost most of our quality customers." As a result, he said, operating losses in sulphur have depressed earnings for Gulf Resources this year.

But, he added, "regardless of developments in Mexico in 1970, we will have a considerable increase in earnings per share" for Gulf Resources. Improvements are expected in earnings of other operations of the company, including Lithium Corp. of America and Bunker Hill Co. "There is every indication that earnings from other than sulphur will be improved by substantial margins in 1970; we see extremely attractive growth for the future without the sulphur operation," Mr. Allen said.

In another development yesterday, Gulf Resources said it agreed in principle to acquire C&K Coal Co., Clarion, Pa., for common stock valued at more than $6 million.

The proposal calls for Gulf Resources to exchange 500,000 to 560,000 common shares for all outstanding stock of C&K, which is closely held. The exact number would depend on the average closing price of Gulf Resources common on the New York Stock Exchange for a period yet to be determined. It closed yesterday at $12.50, down $1.625.

The transaction is subject to the approval of a definitive agreement by C&K holders and Gulf Resources directors. C&K owns coal reserves of about 18 million tons in west central Pennsylvania.

As previously reported, Gulf Resources had a 63% decline in operating net income in the first nine months, to $1.6 million, or 26 cents a share, from year-earlier operating profit of $4.4 million, or $1.01 a share. For the nine months, the company reported a loss of $515,900 from the sulphur operations; in 1968, those operations resulted in a net gain of $1.8 million.

CLOSING DATE DELAYED

Last August, Gulf Resources signed a purchase agreement with Inversiones Azufreras for the sale by Sept. 2 of its sulphur operations for $24 million in cash and notes. Earlier this week, Gulf Resources disclosed that the closing date of the sale had been delayed to Dec. 1 because a number of rulings pertinent to the completion of the transaction hadn't been received from several Mexican government ministries.

In his talk to Houston analysts, Mr. Allen charged that several of the Mexican officials whose approval is needed are stockholders and directors of another Mexican group that owns two-thirds of Azufrera Panamericana S.A., an affiliate of Pan American Sulphur Co. Their aim, he suggested, is to force Gulf Resources into a distress sale of its sulphur properties, which then would be combined with those of Azufrera Panamericana.

Gulf Resources wouldn't object to such a combination if it were to receive an adequate price for its sulphur subsidiary, Mr. Allen said. In fact, he added, Gulf Resources has been approached on several occasions by Mexican representatives of Azufrera Panamericana. "Each time we told them that we were interested," he said.

PRODUCTION RESTRICTIONS

Gulf Resources' troubles in Mexico date back to early this year, shortly after it had been granted, in December, a license to export 416,000 tons of sulphur in 1970. But in January, the company was notified by the Mexican government that production would be restricted to 250,000 tons in 1969 and that 150,000 tons of that amount would have to be sold to consumers in Mexico.

Because of these factors, Mr. Allen said, Gulf Resources produced only 176,000 tons in the first nine months and sold only 141,000 tons. In the first nine months of 1968, Gulf Resources produced 238,000 tons of sulphur selling 192,000 tons.

GULF RESOURCES TO HALT SULPHUR OPERATIONS IN MEXICO IN 1970; PLANNED SALE TERMINATED

HOUSTON.—Gulf Resources & Chemical Corp. will suspend sulphur operations in Mexico after Jan. 1.

Robert H. Allen, president, said the move is being made because the Mexican government won't grant "the necessary rulings and assurances required to permit the proposed purchase of Gulf Resources' Mexican subsidiaries by Inversiones Azufreras S.A."

Mr. Allen added that Nacional Financiera S.A., the Mexican government development bank, has informed the intended purchaser of the Gulf Resources properties that the rulings wouldn't be forthcoming. As a result, he said, Inversiones Azufreras has given Gulf Resources notice of termination of the purchase agreement signed last August, which called for closing of the transaction today.

Inversiones Azufreras, a company formed for the acquisition of the Gulf Resources properties, is associated with a diversified financial and industrial group headed by Alberto Bailleres of Mexico City.

PRESSURES TO "MEXICANIZE"

Gulf Resources was going to sell the properties to the Mexican group because of pressures to "Mexicanize." Mr. Allen said the restrictions imposed on sulphur production and sales beginning last January "were clearly intended to encourage Mexicanization."

In Mexico City, sources close to the government disputed Mr. Allen's charges that the Mexican government was responsible for canceling the planned sale. They claimed that Gulf Resources is seeking to blame Mexican government officials for its failure to negotiate the sale of its surphur properties under favorable terms.

Industry sources in Mexico City added that the continuing depressed state of sulphur demand and prices was a factor in making the Inversiones Azufreras group less anxious to complete the purchase of the Gulf Resources properties.

The Mexico City sources also said Nacional Financiera had been asked to act as the guarantor of the purchase. The development bank refused to do this unless the purchase terms and conditions were of a nature that "would satisfy the standards used by any responsible bank," one observer said.

In his announcement of the pending closedown of operations in Mexico, Mr. Allen said that at the time the agreement for sale of Gulf Resources' properties was signed he had been informed that Nacional Financiera would receive approximately 40% of the stock in Inversiones Azufreras on completion of the transaction.

Mr. Allen continued that restrictions imposed last January by the Mexican government on Gulf Resources' production and sales of sulphur had resulted in a severe economic loss to Gulf Resources. As a result, he added, "Gulf has been unable to protect its position in the sulphur market."

He said also that because of this and falling sulphur prices the company could only expect higher losses in the future if sulphur operations were continued. "Operation of the sulphur subsidiaries at their current level requires the expenditure of approximately $500,000" a month which must be provided "through sale of sulphur or through advances from Gulf," Mr. Allen said.

INVESTMENT TO BE PROTECTED

In view of the Mexican government's refusal to issue rulings that would enable the sale to take place, Mr. Allen said, the company couldn't permit the operations in Mexico to continue to affect profit and interfere with Gulf Resources' growth in the U.S.

Although operations will be suspended, "All steps required to keep the concession agreement in force and to protect the company's investment in Mexico will be taken," Mr. Allen said.

He added that Gulf Resources will provide a reserve by an extraordinary charge to income during 1969 to cover the estimated costs of termination pay required under Mexican laws, of closing the facilities and of maintaining the facilities in idle condition for the next several years. The charge, he said, will be shown as an increase in the loss of sulphur operations for 1969. Costs incurred in future years as a result of suspension of operations will be charged to the reserve and won't affect earnings of Gulf Resources, he added.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in order to complete the history of this matter, it might be well to reprint in the RECORD at this time the speech I made on May 14, 1965, about the proposed outrage at that time which I believe was headed off as a result of that speech. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE OUTRAGE IN MEXICO

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President——

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, with the crisis which arose in the Dominican Republic, it may very well be that many of my colleagues and other American citizens may have overlooked the recent action taken by another Latin American neighbor, Mexico, respecting American sulfur interests. Under what appears to be the pretext of protecting its natural resources in the form of sulfur reserves, the Mexican Government has announced that it will limit exports under a formula which very well may prevent the two American companies operating in Mexico—Gulf Sulphur Corp. and Pan American Sulphur Co.—from exporting sulfur produced there. This action on the part of the Mexican Government is tantamount to expropriation since Mexico is unable to consume sulfur in quantities nearly sufficient to make it financially feasible for Pan American and Gulf Sulphur to continue their mining operations.

This being the case, the only alternative would be for these American-owned companies to make some arrangement to sell or otherwise dispose of their investment in Mexico. Since American investors certainly would not risk putting dollars into an industry which has been deprived of its basic markets, the only alternative would seem to be a forced sale to the Mexican Government or to local nationals selected by Mexico. Although the Mexican Government probably will argue that they have not taken over the sulfur industry, the fact remains that what they are doing will have that result, the only difference being that it will be shrouded in a veil of respectability under the name of conservation. Instead of directly taking over the American sulfur interests, Mexico is simply forcing them out of business.

As has been advocated in the Senate before, it is high time that the American Government take some steps toward preventing the loss of American dollars abroad through expropriation, especially in the case of those countries to whom we give great sums in economic aid. Mexico is one of those countries. Why should we, as a country, support the economic program of a nation which in turn imposes economic sanctions against our citizens? In the case of the American sulfur industry in Mexico, we are not talking about so-called robber barons who have exploited for huge profits the resources and people of an underprivileged or economically depressed nation. If this were the situation there might be some merit, or at least an excuse, for forcing out American industry. However, let us look at the facts with respect to one of the companies which may stand to lose its entire investment in Mexico. Gulf Sulphur Corp. is a relatively small company which completed construction of mine facilities early in 1956 at a cost of $10 million and began operations in May of that year. The company employs 500 people, only 17 of whom are U.S. citizens. Most of these employees work in Salinas, which is a town of 3,500 people, located in the semi-tropical State of Vera Cruz. Before the sulfur company came to Salinas, the people depended upon river water in its unpurified state for drinking and cooking, but they are now receiving potable water from the mining operations. The nearest hospital was an hour and a half away by boat, but the mining company now maintains a well-equipped hospital with two doctors and four nurses who treat the villagers. The company gave to the union to which its employees belong a school that the town theretofore had been unable to afford. Four years ago only 45 pupils were enrolled in the school's 6 grades, while today there are 375 attending a modern 10-classroom school, well staffed with qualified teachers. In addition, its students who wish to continue their education through high school at a distant town are provided transportation expenses and through a full scholarship program some students will go on to one of Mexico's colleges or universities. Gulf Sulphur Corp. also has a project underway for building 118 houses and a large community building in Salinas, which will cost approximately $260,000. This project, of course, will have to be abandoned in the event that it must give up its operations due to the action of the Mexican Government.

What I have outlined here clearly shows that this company, rather than trying to exploit the citizens of Mexico, has given to them benefits far and above those which could be provided by their own government. This is not a case of an American company reaping the riches of a depressed country by using low labor costs to extract its natural resources solely for the personal gain of its investors. Since 1956, expenditures by Gulf

Sulphur Corp. in Mexico, in the form of royalties, taxes, salaries, wages, profitsharing, medical, and social benefits to employees, and other expenses have totaled approximately 600 million pesos. Currently 80 percent of each peso generated from sulfur sales is being left in Mexico. The balance, or 20 percent of each peso, has been used to pay freight on sulfur shipments from Mexico, construct liquid sulful terminals in the United States, service debt created in the United States, and for general and administrative costs. To date, the stockholders of the company have not been paid dividends.

The tragedy of this irresponsible action of the Mexican Government, therefore, lies not only with the loss of investment by American citizens, but also by the loss of jobs and benefits to the Mexican citizens, as well as the destruction of advantages accruing to the Mexican nation itself.

It may also be asked: Just who are these American investors who stand to lose their money. In the case of Gulf Sulphur Corp., there are about 5,000 stockholders, all of whom are U.S. citizens with the exception of 18 who are Mexican nationals, and most of whom can ill afford such a loss. Actually, these shareholders have already suffered a substantial decrease in their stock's value as a result of the announcement by the Government of Mexico of its intent to limit exports of sulfur. On April 25, 1965, when Mexico made its announcement, Gulf Sulphur stock was selling on the American Stock Exchange at $12.50 a share, and it is presently selling for around $7. It takes no economic expert to see that a great deal of harm has already been done.

It is, of course, not within the power of the Congress of the United States to prevent the Government of Mexico from taking such action as it may desire with respect to its internal affairs, but it is within our power to see that any government which by means of expropriation of American property or economic sanctions having the same effect, is not subsidized by us in these efforts. That is exactly what we do when we send millions of dollars to these countries in an attempt to help build up their economy and they in turn confiscate U.S. investments, undermining the Alliance for Progress, and scaring American capital away from all of Latin America. When we help friendly governments to improve the conditions of their people, we should make it law that our help stops the moment their officials start robbing us.

Several years ago I was successful in persuading the Foreign Relations Committee to accept an amendment forbidding foreign aid to nations that confiscate American investments. Subsequently the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] perfected my proposal to make it apply to schemes of this nature which are, in fact, a subtle form of confiscation, although the prompter of the steal pretends otherwise. The perfected legislation has come to be known as the Hickenlooper amendment.

I am, therefore, inquiring of the State Department whether the neoconfiscation to which I have referred comes within the Hickenlooper amendment. If not, then I intend to offer an amendment to the foreign aid bill to see that foreign aid is denied to perpetrators of this sort of steal.

It was the efforts of the junior Senator from Louisiana which were responsible for amending the language in the Sugar Act, to make certain that the United States would not pay a bonus for sugar to countries which are in the process of confiscating American investments. The amendment to that act does not have the refinements of the Hickenlooper amendment, so that act may need an additional amendment. As the Senator who managed the sugar bill in the Senate some years ago, and who has been a constant advocate of sugar legislation for the benefit of both our own sugar producers and our friends abroad, I intend to exert my best efforts to perfect the language I insisted on when the amendment to the Sugar Act was before us, to make certain that nations that confiscate our investments will not sell us sugar at premium prices. If I have anything to say about it, they will not sell us any sugar.

It is only by demonstrating to people who have this kind of scheme in mind that their nations will suffer by such actions that we shall be able to make certain that Americans who in good faith invest their money, on the encouragement both of their own Government and the recipient nation, will have an opportunity to develop resources on a basis which will be good both for us and for those who receive benefits from the investments, without having the investments stolen from them after a company has made a success of them.

Mr. President, along this line, and in support of my argument, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Robbing the Gringo; the Outrage in Mexican Sulphur Turns Back the Clock," published in Barron's National Business & Financial Weekly for May 3, 1965.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"ROBBING THE GRINGO—THE OUTRAGE IN MEXICAN SULFUR TURNS BACK THE CLOCK

"Successful investing, as the financial community will cheerfully attest, requires hard work, judgment and nerve. Now and then, however, luck takes a hand in the game. In 'Reminiscences of a Stock Operator,' a fascinating account of Wall Street 50 years ago, the author tells of dropping into his broker's office one Friday morning in the spring of 1906, and, merely on a hunch, selling short several thousand shares of Union Pacific Railroad. Over the weekend came word of the San Francisco earthquake. On the other side of the ledger, brokers still shudder at the fate of their ill-starred colleague who, shortly before the collapse of the fats and oil empire of Tino De Angelis, became a partner in the doomed firm of Ira Haupt & Co. Ten days ago one of the ablest investment advisers in the business fell afoul of fortune. When Pan American Sulfur Co. common, which sold as high as 59 in early April, recently declined to 50, this old pro viewed the move as an 'exceptional buying opportunity.' Thus he took his position in the stock—and told the world about it—just before the bottom dropped out.

"In his misery over Pan Am Sulfur (or Pasco, as it is known), the unlucky expert today has plenty of company. Except in a major bear market, few securities have suffered so drastic or abrupt a decline: since reaching the high less than a month ago, the shares have lost more than 40 percent of their value. Hence the plunge caught a good many knowledgeable Wall Streeters long. Several brokerage firms and advisory services recently recommended the stock. Chartists projected a clear-cut uptrend. Institutional investors at latest reckoning owned over 400,000 shares, or roughly one-fifth of the total equity.

"Their confidence rested on apparently solid ground; until mid-April, Pan American Sulfur had all the earmarks of a growth company in a resurgent industry. Virtually overnight, however, its glowing prospects have dimmed. For the Government of Mexico (where its properties lie) arbitrarily has imposed export restrictions which have hampered its day-to-day operations and will halt its long-term expansion. The new decrees are designed to conserve Mexico's supply of a vital raw material. They will have other, less palatable results. For one thing, they are likely to create a new privileged class of local entrepreneur with close, and doubtless mutually profitable, connections with officialdom. What is worse, the episode is bound to jeopardize the inflow of foreign capital. For a quarter-century Mexico has sought, with considerable success of late, to live down its ill-advised expropriation of United States and British oil interests. Last month, the Government suddenly acted like a reformed bandit who cannot give up his old tricks. Robbing the gringo, as everyone south of the Rio Grande should have learned by now, is no way to get rich.

"In Mexico, as in other parts of the world, highway robbery today may go cloaked in legality. As the Pan American Sulfur Co. carefully noted in its listing application, its operations are subject to inspection, study and regulation by the Mexican Government; production and exports are subject to limitation, and, in order to export sulfur from Mexico, a permit from the Mexican Government is required * * *. After years of bureaucratic routine, the authorities last month suddenly invoked their powers. Without explanation or warning, they held up one of Pasco's shipments. After several days of painful uncertainty, they finally disclosed their purpose. Mexico has imposed export quotas on Pan American Sulfur and a smaller competitor, Gulf Sulfur. Under the new conidtions, both U.S.-owned producers this year may ship without hindrance half of last year's volume; the other half, as well as all future quotas, will hinge on their discovery of fresh reserves (10 percent of which may be exported). In no event may either company exceed last year's total sales abroad.

"The new restrictions, so the Secretary of the National Patrimony has avered, aim to protect Mexico's supply of sulfur, which otherwise soon might run out. The quaintly named official surely knows better. While traces of the mineral turned up a half-century ago, Mexico for all practical purposes had no reserves until a handful of daring U.S. promoters, financed by American capital, launched programs of exploration and development after World War II. Ten years ago the country produced less than 100,000 tons; last year, in striking contrast, output approached 2 million. Since the Government estimates current proven reserves at nearly 16 million tons—a figure which other sources regard as far too low—fears of future shortage, even at the recent recordbreaking rate of shipment, hardly can account for the abrupt flexing of bureaucratic muscle. A likelier explanation, in our own jaundiced view, is the striking shift in the marketplace, which has transformed sulfur, after years of oversupply, into a relatively scarce, highly profitable commodity, a prize which local interests have grown greedy to share. Heads we win, the Mexicans have told the U.S. producers in legal language, tails you lose.

"The new rules faithfully embody what might be called the looter's code. For they bestow valuable privileges on one group (seven prospective entries, all of which boast majority control by local interests, already have applied for sulfur concessions) at the expense of another; i.e., the industry's pioneers. Both Pan American and Gulf, as the stock market belatedly has realized, will suffer in various ways. Much sulfur is sold on long-term contracts, which, in view of the massive uncertainties surrounding exports after January 1, henceforth will be hard to come by. Any business enterprise must plan for the future; in the case of both Pan American and Gulf, however, production and sales schedules apparently will hinge on the unpredictable discovery and proof of fresh reserves. Perhaps the worst of all, by making last year's results the ceiling, the authorities have slapped a lid on further growth.

"To one of the most inspiring pages in the annals of postwar capitalism, the dead hand of Government thus threatens a sorry end. On the industrial map of the world, the Isthmus of Tehuantepec represents quite an achievement. To put it there, men took enormous financial risks. Despite the backing of the Export-Import Bank, one venture, the Mexican Gulf Sulfur Co., went broke when its reserves petered out; Gulf Sulfur in its early years piled up a staggering deficit. Once in operation, the fledgling producers plunged into competition with such powerful rivals as Texas Gulf Sulfur and Freeport, thereby shattering one of the most lucrative and longest-lived cartels in history. (Shares of both concerns, which will benefit from Mexico's folly, shot up last week.) Far from exploiting the hapless natives, finally, the two producers have made a major contribution to the nation's economic life. Mexico collects a 15-percent royalty on every ton of sulfur mined, as well as nearly half the producer's pretax profits. Pasco last year accounted for $21 million of the gross national product; all told, since it was organized, the company has bought and paid for nearly $150 million worth of local goods and services. Against such a record of achievement, official concern over the 'national patrimony' adds insult to injury.

"On the latter score, thanks to the Mexican authorities, U.S. investors are out-of-pocket over $50 million. In the end, however, Mexico is apt to be the biggest loser. Nearly 30 years ago President Cardenas, with a stroke of the pen, destroyed his country's credit and set back its development. Those who refuse to learn from history are doomed to repeat it."

ELIMINATION OF THE MENACE OF LEAD-BASED PAINT POISONING OF CHILDREN

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in the years before World War II, lead poisoning was a common-enough occurence to warrant a vigorous attack against its causes. Cases of lead intoxication among adults are rare today, even in lead processing and lead-using industries where the possibility of overexposure seems greatest.

These improvements are the direct result of broadly increased knowledge about the physiological effects of lead as well as extended research on ways to protect against lead poisoning hazards.

One insidiously damaging problem area still remains a threat to the health of thousands of children, lead-based paint poisoning.

Generally, buildings constructed more than 30 years ago are the prime source of lead-based paint poisoning today. Particularly in big city slum areas is this danger highest. Chips of peeling paint from radiators and flaking paint from deteriorating walls create the major source of this hazard because young children have a natural tendency to place objects in their mouths. Flaking paint chips seem to be a particularly appealing item to children with pica, which is a condition of abnormal appetite that makes children want to eat nonfood items.

Children also fall victim to lead intoxication by chewing on lead-painted windowsills, baseboards, or other surfaces.

Major sources of present-day contamination with lead, aside from deteriorating housing, include solder, food processing, gasoline engine exhaust, and industrial waste.

Lead poisoning or plumbism, in our contemporary urbanizing society, is one of society's defects that lie just below the surface. To the lay community and even to a major part of the medical community, this problem exists much like an iceberg; only a small part of its enormity is visible on the surface. But, since lead poisoning is an entirely preventable disease, it is appropriate that the public and the medical community be made aware of the problem.

New York City once averaged 500 cases of lead poisoning a year; the city health department now estimates that a "silent epidemic" of lead contamination may be affecting as many as 25,000 slum children.

In 1965, the board of health in Chicago termed the city's 12 reported lead poisoning deaths to be of "epidemic proportions" and launched a screening program to detect victims of poisoning. Through September 1966, tests on 30,000 youngsters turned up 700 youngsters for treatment of lead poisoning.

Rochester, N.Y., reports show about 7 percent of that city's preschool slum children poisoned by lead. In Baltimore, the incidence is reported at 7 percent and in Cleveland it is 6 percent.

Children's Hospital in Boston estimates the incidence of the disease in the slum areas of that community include 5 to 10 percent of the children from 1 to 5 years of age. Other evidence shows that the incidence in the newer suburbs built after World War II is less than 1 in 1,000.

In the summer of 1968, of 800 children screened in one high risk area of Boston, 98 had evidence of lead poisoning and required treatment.

Across the Nation reports show that children between 1 and 3 years of age are the sufferers in 85 percent of all reported cases. Two-year-olds account for more than 50 percent of the deaths attributable to lead poisoning. About 200 children die from lead poisoning every year. Estimates of the number of children that may be poisoned by lead each year ranges as high as 400,000. Between 12,000 and 16,000 are treated and survive. Half of those who receive treatment are left mentally retarded. Only about one case in 25 of these is treated.

Although the rate of deaths directly attributable to lead poisoning has dropped in recent years and there is an almost certain chance of saving children who are diagnosed as lead victims, for many of those who survive, the outlook remains grim. Brain damage and damage to the central nervous system looms as one of the most tragic consequences of high lead levels. In one study of youngsters who were followed 6 months to 10 years after treatment for plumbism, there were cases of recurrent seizures, cerebral palsy, eye disorders, and mental retardation. The exact incidence of lead poisoning as a cause of mental retardation is not known. Yet there is considerable evidence that victims of lead poisoning show unsatisfactory school progress because of intellectual defects. Many other children have been found to experience a marked drop in IQ.

Mr. President, it is alarming to learn that even after treatment, many of these young survivors have a substantial chance of suffering brain damage, and many of these tiny victims simply become complete vegetables. Once a child has been poisoned by lead, he is very likely to be poisoned again. After returning home from treatment children often resume their paint eating habits, and if they again come down with lead poisoning, the risk of permanent brain damage increases to "virtually 100 percent."

We know that lead poisoning affects black and Puerto Rican children more frequently that it strikes white children. It is most likely to strike children in the same family.

During his lifetime, a severely retarded child can cost health agencies $250,000 in caretaking expenses. Yet, we can prevent and cure the disease for less than $1,000 per child.

In past years, when six or seven cases of polio were reported, alarms and frantic reactions spread wildly through our cities. But cases of lead poisoning are known to be more than 10 times those of polio and nobody notices them. That is the cruelest and most ironic part of this tragedy—a poorly informed public.

Many parents are not aware of the danger associated with the consequence of paint ingestion. Even when parents know a child is eating paint, they often do not know that this is a hazardous habit. Unfortunately, the medical community is not usually aware of this hazard either. Treatment of lead poisoning necessarily involves making the diagnosis first. That is not a usually considered diagnosis because the symptoms are very much like those caused by other maladies. Moreover, most physicians generally are as unaware as laymen that this threat is a common one in some communities of our society.

It seems to me that an informed community can be a rational and effective deterrent to plumbism in children. Families that know about the danger of peeling paints will bring their children to clinics for screening and therapy. Those same families will be more likely to report deteriorating housing conditions to the proper authorities. Finally, community education through publicity, public warnings, and programs to screen high-risk areas for victims helps to insure an informed public.

Mr. President, I have personally joined the battle against childhood lead intoxication by stressing the need for education and awareness of the problem—both in the general public and in the medical community. I recently asked the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare for advice on ways to increase the availability of information of this dread disease. The Department's very informative publication, "Lead Poisoning in Children" should be in the hands of every family and landowner in the high-risk areas of our big cities. Perhaps with posters, bilingual broadcasts, periodic statistical reports, and community meetings, we may be able to alert families to the dangers of this menace.

In addition, I am prepared to introduce legislation that is designed to erase the hazards of lead-based paint poisoning from our urban neighborhoods.

Last March Representative WILLIAM RYAN of New York responded to the need for legislation in this crucial area by introducing in the House of Representatives a package of reforms "aimed at combating this silent epidemic." That package realistically meets the three fundamental needs that must be attacked in the assault on childhood lead poisoning. Because I fully endorse BILL RYAN'S approach to the problem, I am prepared to introduce similar legislation in the Senate.

In remarks included in the RECORD of the Senate on November 13, I listed the three basic requirements for eliminating lead paint poisoning as a hazard to our Nation's children. For the sake of emphasis, today I would like to repeat the three fundamental steps we must take to get rid of lead poisoning.

They are: First, to identify and treat lead poisoning victims; second, to seek out the presence of lead-based paints and require property owners and landlords to remove such paints from all wall surfaces; and third, we must prevent lead poisoning from spreading through our cities' neighborhoods by enforcing existing housing codes.

Mr. President, I am preparing a bill that will reach these goals by insuring communities that an active, vigorous campaign will eradicate the menace of lead-based paint poisoning. My bill provides Federal moneys to help cities carry out programs to identify those youngsters who are affected by lead-based paint poisoning. It will insure for cities and communities the procedures and techniques that will seek out those youngsters who are currently afflicted with high lead levels. Health officials have found that when they go out looking for cases they find them, and the more they look the more they find.

The Children's Hospital Medical Center in Boston dramatically demonstrated the value of that kind of screening program in the summer of 1968. In a group of 800 youngsters believed to be highly susceptible to the lead hazard, doctors found 98 cases of poisoning and provided therapy for them. Louis Kapito, Randolph Byers, and Harry Shwachman of Boston's Children's Hospital have found that tests on samples of children's hair are a revealing indication of high lead levels. They particularly note that the ready availability of hair as a specimen, the ease with which it can be collected, sorted, and transported are the outstanding features that favor it as a screening device for lead poisoning. This kind of testing, coupled with programs used in other cities can be used to detect victims in other communities. In every community that has launched a screening program the number of reported cases of lead intoxication has climbed sharply.

My bill also provides for financial assistance to cities and communities to develop and carry out intensive local programs to eliminate the causes of lead-based paint poisoning. Every community that has old homes with interior painted walls containing lead is a potential high-risk area for this dread disease. Plumbism is a recurrent disease by the very nature of the social and economic conditions which foster its existence. It is not necessarily limited to the ghetto. Older, currently affluent residential communities in the center core cities such as Park Avenue, Cambridge, and Georgetown await deterioration and the creation of a slum in which lead poisoning can prevail.

Therefore, my bill will provide money to use such present methods for preventing the disease as covering walls and ceilings with a plaster board, removing the old paint and covering old flaking walls and ceiling with a tough plastic spray layer which can be coated with lead-free paints.

Finally, in recognition of the need to insure that the rehabilitation or renovation of housing shall include plans for eliminating the causes of lead-based paint poisoning, my bill provides for Federal assistance to communities to carry out such rehabilitation only on the condition that the community also carry out an effective plan for getting rid of the causes of lead-based paint poisoning. In too many instances, the enforcement of existing housing and health codes becomes buried in a bureaucratic morass. Local health departments look at the problem as a housing agency responsibility, and local housing authorities are known to have insisted that lead poisoning is the sole responsibility of the health department. Still, in other instances it is financially expedient for landlords to pay a fine or abandon buildings because of the high cost of rehabilitation.

I am hopeful that through the three provisions of my bill we can easily take advantage of new techniques, an enlightened populace, and readily available medicines to rid American cities of childhood lead poisoning.

Lead poisoning sickens at least 225,000 children a year in the United States. It is a needless cause of mental retardation and death in young children. Lead intoxication is a manmade disease. It is subject to complete control. In cases that are not too severe it can be completely cured with no aftereffects. It is not one of those social or medical ills that requires intensive study to search out its cause, or thorough research to find its cure. We know that it is caused when young children swallow bits and chips of lead-based paints peeling from deteriorating walls—usually in the homes of our Nation's poorest citizens.

We also know what can cure youngsters of this disease. Once a lead poisoning case is detected, the child is usually hospitalized for several days and treated with chelating agents—chemicals that bind that lead and remove it from body tissue. Before chelation therapy was developed, 66 percent of severe lead poisoning cases were fatal. With early detection and treatment, this figure has probably dropped to less than 5 percent.

Thus, I am enthusiastic about the legislative thrust of Congressman RYAN'S package and the proposals in my bill because they do not endorse the usual call for study and contemplation. Instead, my bill authorizes a direct, forthright approach to this debilitating hazard.

The principal obstacle we face will be instilling in the public's eye the urgency for immediate action. Landlords will protest when they have to panel or strip their buildings. They will say they cannot afford it, and some of them will not be able to. Dr. Rene Dubos, who won a Pulitzer prize for his book, "So Human an Animal," likens the elimination of lead poisoning in the slums to the pasteurization of milk. At one time, the dairy people insisted there was no way to market milk that was guaranteed not to give tuberculosis. The public demanded, and it was done. Dr. Dubos says the same must be done with lead. He believes this problem is so well defined that it may provide an occasion to introduce a kind of social accounting.

If we do not act in a ruthless manner on this limited problem, then I believe that our society is intellectually and morally dishonest in talking about improving social conditions or improving our total environment. If we, with all our technological means, are not willing to make the effort that would be demanded to get rid of lead poisoning, then our society deserves all the disasters that may come to it.

The cost of lead poisoning is borne by the whole community in terms of wasted human resources, institutionalization of victims, and the resulting burdens on municipal health facilities and finances. The benefits accrue only to those owners of slum property who find it unprofitable to keep their properties in good repair.

The need to eliminate this hazard from the list of the many hazards that affect our Nation's children is very clear. My efforts will be designed to meet that need.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

RETIREMENT OF DR. GEORGE E. MUELLER FROM NASA

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, when Dr. George E. Mueller leaves the National Aeronautics and Space Administration on December 10, 1969, an era of the space age will have come to an end. It might be called the end of the beginning—the end of the beginning of the amazingly successful man-on-the-moon program.

For Dr. Mueller has been in charge of the Apollo program, and to him must go the primary recognition for the tremendous achievement of that program. It was probably the greatest sustained scientific achievement in the history of mankind.

But its great value to our Nation and to our people goes far beyond the scientific achievement. Like nothing else before, our putting a man on the moon and returning him safely has done more to raise the prestige of the United States than any other preceding achievement.

More than that, at a time when the U.S. Government has been the buffeted target of vilification, not only throughout the world, but as well from within our own Nation, our placing a man on the moon and returning him—and doing it openly on worldwide television—has not only thrilled the people of the entire world but has created immeasurable goodwill and friendliness for us.

We have spent billions upon billions of dollars in foreign aid and in mutual security assistance trying to buy the friendship of the people of the world. But for the greater part, we have not been able to purchase friendship and support through the billions spent on foreign aid and mutual security.

To the contrary, instead of harvesting friendship, respect, and support from these multibillion-dollar programs, we have too often and to too great a degree reaped enmity, resentment and contempt. Even those Western European nations, like France, which we saved through the Marshall plan, have repeatedly given us the back of their hands economically and in the United Nations—after their rise from economic chaos to such economic affluence as to regard the United States too often with arrogance and treat us with contempt.

What we have not been able to accomplish with the billions we spent for foreign aid and mutual security, we have accomplished to a high degree with our truly inspirational success on the Apollo program.

And for that we owe a very, very grateful thanks to Dr. George E. Mueller on his stewardship of the Apollo program. The United States and its people are in deep debt to Dr. George E. Mueller.

He has been the inspirational leader of a team of over 400,000 people from government, industry, and universities. Unrelentingly, he has driven toward the goal of the program that has raised the United States again to preeminence—and after the state of shock in the late fifties when our space failures made us a second-rate national power on space exploration.

Dr. Mueller had a rare knack for translating and relating the high technical and scientific space program into words and phrases and presentations that even we nontechnicians and nonscientists on the Senate aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee could understand. He could make even me understand.

So I am going to miss Dr. Mueller very much in the work of the committee. Just as I do not think anyone will ever be able to fill the shoes of James Webb as the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, I really do not think that anyone will be able to fill the shoes of Dr. Mueller.

NOMINATION OF HENRY J. TASCA AS AMBASSADOR TO GREECE

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, Henry J. Tasca, originally of Providence, R.I., who has been nominated by President Nixon as our Ambassador to Athens, is a competent and able American Foreign Service officer. He has been well and favorably known to me for 25 years.

Unfortunately, at this time his nomination is caught in the fiery cross winds of American-Greek relations. Actually, his nomination would fare better if our administration had a clear and strong policy vis-a-vis Greece. Unfortunately, this is not the case today.

As far as I can ascertain, the Defense Department, which too often calls our foreign policy tunes, approves of the present regime. On the other hand, the State Department seems to disapprove of it, although it is not willing to express its views publicly, although it has privately.

In my view, our administration should recognize the fact that the present best thing for Greece would be the early restoration of some form of democracy or government that would reflect the wishes of the independent and individualistic Greeks. And our State Department should express itself accordingly.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks an article entitled "Tough Job for Mr. Tasca," written by Ian Vorres, and published in the Providence Journal of November 30, 1969.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENVOY TO GREECE: TOUGH JOB FOR MR. TASCA

(By Ian Vorres)

ATHENS, GREECE.—Of all postwar American ambassadors to Greece, none is faced with a more difficult and thankless mission than Providence-born Henry J. Tasca, the new American ambassador to Greece.

A leading economist and scholar, Mr. Tasca has held many important positions in Washington and abroad. He was awarded the Medal of Freedom. A U.S. Navy commander during World War II, he has served as U.S. Treasury representative and economic adviser of the American Embassy in Rome.

Mr. Tasca was until recently U.S. ambassador to Morocco. He is expected to arrive in Athens before Christmas. Although he has yet to set foot on Greek soil, he is in the unenviable position of being already the center of controversy, drawing upon himself the ire both of the supporters and the opponents of Greece's army-backed regime.

"He is a sitting duck for all the political tempers of Greece which are currently spilling over. I would hate to be in his shoes just now," commented a Western ambassador in Athens recently.

Political observers in Athens anticipate that Mr. Tasca's relations with Greece's revolutionary regime will be cool and formal especially if, as it is rumored, he is arriving from Washington with definite instructions to "be tough." The Greek military brass, meanwhile, is well entrenched, ruling the country by decree.

Government circles in Athens are increasingly incensed over the refusal of the United States to ship heavy military hardware to the Greek army which is in dire need of it. Premier George Papadopoulos, it is expected, will express in no uncertain terms the resentment of his government to the new U.S. envoy. The heavy arms embargo had been adopted both by the Johnson and Nixon administrations as a way of exerting pressure on the Greek regime to return the country to full democracy promptly.

Another sore point with the Athens regime has been the delay in appointing a new U.S. ambassador. Mr. Tasca succeeds Phillips Talbot who resigned last December. The Athens post has been vacant since. The absence of a U.S. ambassador for so long was taken as a snub from Washington and proved a continuous embarrassment to the Greek regime.

To complicate matters, Mr. Tasca's recent statements before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in Washington have not exactly helped him gain popularity with the present rulers of Greece. Mr. Tasca in his testimony said that the exchange of ambassadors does not necessarily imply approval of the Greek government. Mr. Tasca also said that he "would like to see Greece evolve to a more representative form of government" and that he would use whatever influence he has to that end.

Ironically enough, Mr. Tasca has also come under heavy fire from opposition groups in Greece who see his appointment as U.S. endorsement of the Athens regime. Even King Constantine, exiled in Rome, has been reported concerned over the appointment. Authoritative sources confirm that he even discussed the matter with Greek Foreign Minister Panayotis Pipinelis when the latter was recuperating in Switzerland recently. It is known that the King wants Mr. Tasca to call on him before proceeding to Athens. This would show publicly that the United States still considers Constantine the lawful ruler of Greece.

Greek resistance groups, meanwhile, have openly warned U.S. servicemen, businessmen and diplomatic personnel in Greece that they plan reprisals against them over the Tasca appointment. A group even threatened Americans with kidnapping and possible execution. Some Athenians believe that fanatical opponents of the regime might even try to kidnap Ambassador Tasca the way U.S. Ambassador C. Burke Elbrick was kidnapped on a Rio de Janeiro street last September.

Greek officials are not particularly worried. They feel they have the situation well in hand. Athens security police recently rounded up more than 50 persons who were exploding plastic bombs around the city. The consequent trials before military courts revealed a sadly disheartened underground, lacking in coherence, organization and public support.

Athens police are confident that they have broken the backbone of the underground movement. Greek security, however, is not taking any chances. Neither does the U.S. Embassy in Athens. Besides tackling the toughest job a U.S. ambassador ever faced in Greece, Mr. Tasca already may claim the heaviest police protection ever accorded a U.S. envoy on Greek soil.

THE MEDIA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I was impressed by reading an article written by Richard Wilson and published in the Evening Star of December 1, 1969. It expresses the opinion of many Americans and I would assume many of their elected representatives in both parties in the House and Senate.

While no one is suggesting censorship, the radio-TV executives have certainly missed the point in the thoughtful and well reasoned remarks made by Vice President SPIRO T. AGNEW in Des Moines, Iowa, and again in Montgomery, Ala. The points he raised were valid; however, the responses from those referred to in his remarks have been less than enlightening.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TV MISSES PUBLIC'S RESPONSE TO AGNEW SPEECH

(By Richard Wilson)

The available evidence suggests that Vice President Spiro T. Agnew's criticism of bias in the mass media struck a responsive chord among the general public. There is nothing to suggest, however, that the tonal gradations of the responsive chord have penetrated deeply into the hushed chambers where radio-TV network policy is made.

A tonal deafness seems to have developed on what it was Agnew was talking about, with the network moguls all professing to see a dangerous frontal challenge to freedom of speech in their government licensed medium.

The radio-TV executives, therefore, may well ask themselves why it is that as many as three out of four persons think Agnew has a valid point.

The answer to that question could prove to be quite disconcerting. It may merely involve the simple conclusion of a great many people that the commentators now practicing are not qualified by background, information and depth of thought to share equal time with the President of the United States. This is the equivalent of heresy in the broadcasting business. It is unthinkable that some handsome, well-spoken broadcaster with five or 10 years experience should not be entitled to go on the air with his authoritative analysis and be listened to with the same attention and respect as the President or whomever it is the broadcaster is analyzing and judging.

Dr. Frank Stanton, president of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. expounds the current thought in the industry on the point. He attributes to these instant analyzers the ability to call "attention to emphases, omissions, unexpected matters of substance, long anticipated attitudes, changes of views, methods of advocacy or any other aspect of the speech." The analyzers function as critics, in other words, judging this omission or that change of attitude as it seems to strike them in the spirit of guiding and instructing the public on what they ought to think about the speech they have just heard.

In the case of the President's speech on Vietnam, Dr. Stanton points out that the text was handed out to the press and to radio-TV analyzers two hours in advance of delivery. He adds, "If a professional reporter could not arrive at some meaningful observations under those circumstances, we would question his competence." Two hours is enough, it is judged, to permit these highly skilled professionals to gather their thoughts for airing to an audience which assembled before their television sets to hear the President make a major announcement after weeks of study. Otherwise they had better look for work elsewhere than CBS.

It is at this point that a great many TV viewers turn off their sets and turn off Dr. Stanton. They are simply not convinced that the analyzers are professional enough, informed enough or profound enough to share time with the President on major U.S. policy. In the case of Nixon's speech, two hours of deep thought was not enough to reveal to the analyzers that four out of five of the listeners they were instructing would approve of Nixon's stated views on Vietnam.

The TV moguls, in their profound concerns for the right of analyzers to say anything that occurs to them after their gruelling two hours of thought, have simply missed the central point that a vast host of TV watchers do not share the respect with which the analyzers view themselves.

This would be as hard for a TV commentator to accept as for a newspaper columnist, the difference really being that many newspapers give their readers a wider choice of opinion which they can usually adequately sample by reading the first and last paragraphs and thus turn off before they become too deeply involved.

Analysis and interpretation is a great art which only a few, such as Eric Sevareid, have wholly mastered. As Sevareid handles his art, it is to explore a subject rather than to arrive at conclusions on it, and in this way to open his own mind and the minds of listeners to various inherent possibilities. This seems too inconclusive to others whose two hours of thought leads them toward conclusions they would not think so irrefutable if they could hear the concurrent comment of their listeners.

The listeners, who likes comment, wishes along with it at least the versimilitude of fairness and wisdom, and it is perhaps the shortage of this quality in TV commentary which has caused the great majority to agree, in principle at least, with Agnew. The TV business would do better to examine itself a little further while warning of the baleful potential of government repression.

ALLEGED MASSACRE AT MYLAI

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, as the story of the alleged massacre at Mylai (4) in Songmy village, or "Pinkville," has unfolded in the press and on TV, I have been much disturbed. Several concerns come to mind. One relates to the rights of the accused and to our legitimate concern that these soldiers and former military personnel not be tried in the public media, that their right to due process not be jeopardized by pretrial publicity. Hopefully this has not and will not occur. The warning of the judge assigned to the case of Lt. William Calley, is timely and should be heeded.

Deep as is this concern for the rights of the accused, I have become increasingly distressed with other aspects as each new edition of the newspapers these past days has brought to my attention further aspects of this and other incidents in Vietnam. I have been shocked and horrified at the stories recounted.

War is not exactly a stranger to me nor are the stresses and strains of combat. I am well aware of the incomplete nature of President Theodore Roosevelt's remark that war brings out all the best in man. It also seems to bring out the worst, as well. Far too often I have witnessed the bestiality of war. The atrocity pictured and recounted here will now go down in history as the Mylai massacre and take its place along with Lidice, Katyn Forest, and Malmédy.

The concern of some that these disclosures will have a most damaging effect upon our effort in Southeast Asia is, I fear fully justified. However, this concern cannot permit us as a nation to close our eyes to what has occurred. Nor must it prevent us from seeking answers as to why this happened.

For the Nation which took the lead in attempting to establish an international code of morality in warfare at the Nuremberg trials to attempt now to sweep under the rug this flagrant violation of our most solemn principles would but compound the tragedy.

If any way is to be out of this national disgrace, it is to be found only through the prompt, complete, and public investigation of what has occurred, the proper punishment of those responsible, and through every effort to determine why Mylai happened. Let no one minimize the importance of this affair.

A number of questions must be answered:

Is what happened at Mylai (4) only worse in degree than what occurs every day in a war where friend, foe, and neutral are indistinguishable one from the other?

Can we condemn the men charged in this matter and at the same time justify a policy of indescriminate bombing and artillery attacks on inhabited villages and hamlets?

Can we entertain any hopes for success in a guerrilla type war if we fail to distinguish clearly between friend and foe in the punishment we impose?

Are the 2,000 to 3,000 civilians killed by the Vietcong during Tet in Hue to be equated now as justification for the 100 to 200 annihilated by our forces at Mylai in March?

Is our current practice of paying a set price to surviving relatives for each noncombatant Vietnamese man, woman, or child inadvertently or accidently killed by our forces, and to the owner for each water buffalo similarly killed, symbolic of our regard. Have we so cheapened our concept of the sanctity of human life that we can now measure it on the same scale as water buffalo?

Is American training which permits common reference to the Vietnamese as "Gooks," "Dinks," or "Slopes" at fault? Are racist overtones at work here?

And the bigger question: Can we bring self-government to a people with friendship for the United States where attitudes such as these permeate our speech and our actions? Can there be any hope of winning the war in Vietnam under these circumstances?

If our answer to this last question is negative what then should be our course of action?

A few months ago I read a lead article in Esquire magazine entitled "An American Atrocity" by Normand Poirier. As a result, what happened at Mylai did not come as such a surprise. Last August 14 I wrote to the Department of the Navy expressing my concern over the apparent laxity in the handling of this affair. I drew attention to the sentences imposed. Of the 10 Marines involved in what was a planned and organized murder and rape of civilians, one has since been promoted, six are back in civilian life, and only three are in prison of whom two are serving out short sentences. As I said then, the punishment was in sharp contrast to that meted out for incidents such as the "mutiny" at the Presidio.

I have been assured that this marine atrocity which occurred in 1966 has resulted in changed training and indoctrination procedures being adopted by the Marine Corps to prevent a repetition. It is to be hoped that such is the case, but apparently the Army's training and indoctrination procedures have not been effective.

As Private Meadlo's mother said:

I raised my boy to be a good boy.

I think this is a statement every mother with a son in Vietnam would make. Let us hope they will be given no further cause to fear that this war has so changed their sons.

Much as these revelations distress me,

I now see some glimmer of hope. During my time, three wars have transpired, but there may be some progress toward a higher morality. In world war II there were only enemy atrocities. Censorship and sentiment—not unrelated—were such that our brutal bombing of Dresden, or the second atomic bomb at Nagasaki, were questioned by few—at least, not until after the conflict was over. In the Korean war, the atrocities of friend and foe were recounted without recrimination.

Should this Mylai massacre now trigger a national self-examination to seek out flaws in our character previously rationalized or ignored, this can be the beginning of a new day which can draw us together with those who have questioned our involvement and our priorities. Should it result merely in a search for scapegoats, we will have but compromised our ideals further.

For the lessons of Mylai and elsewhere are lessons for all of us to ponder. They are a part of the ongoing national debate over our commitment, our course, and our goals.

As we seek to interpret and explain Mylai we need remind ourselves of our attack on those nations which in the past have adopted a national policy of the ends justifying the means. And we must rededicate our efforts to assure that such a policy never becomes our national epitaph. A shrug of the shoulders and a Sherman-like statement of the evils of war will not suffice. If the American character is to be deserving of special acclaim, it must in this case come from our willingness to engage publicly in critical self-examination and to take corrective measures. If we are truly to atone for such acts, it must come through our increased dedication to join with other nations in efforts to find alternatives to war for settling disputes among men.

FIRST NATIONAL INDIAN EDUCATION CONFERENCE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on November 20 the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE) addressed the first National Indian Education Conference in Minneapolis. The conference brought together the Nation's leaders in Indian education for 2 days of intensive workshops, aimed at reforming the ways in which we educate Indian children.

Senator MONDALE's remarks at that conference focused on the recently released final report of the Subcommittee on Indian Education, which I had the honor to serve as chairman. The Senator succinctly summarized the major findings and recommendations of the subcommittee, and made the report an object of much considered discussion at the conference. I am convinced that through such dissemination and discussion will come the understanding and action needed to bring about the changes recommended in the report.

I might say that as we worked to write that report, no one member of the subcommittee worked harder or with greater understanding than did my good friend from Minnesota. He carried much of the burden and deserves a large share of the credit.

I ask unanimous consent that Senator MONDALE's remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR WALTER F. MONDALE

No conference is ever complete without an address by a noted author in the field under discussion. I see that your conference planners took care of this matter in grand style, providing not only Dr. John Bryde of the University of South Dakota, but also the Pulitzer Prize-winning Indian, Mr. N. Scott Momaday.

Will Antell undoubtedly thought the authors were already taken care of when he invited me to speak here this morning. A politician, you know, is supposed to know how to speak, but not necessarily how to write. Speaking supposedly comes naturally. But as for writing and editing, those are things we are supposed to leave to the experts and literary stylists.

At risk of disappointing Mr. Antell and the rest of you who have been eagerly awaiting a political address, I'd like to step briefly out of my U.S. Senator's role and talk to you as an author—the author of a newly-published book.

I'm afraid the title of this book lacks both the intrigue of Mr. Momaday's "House Made of Dawn," and the intellectualness of Dr. Bryde's "Accultural Psychology" or "Modern Indian Psychology." In fact, my title has all the sexiness of a used Volkswagen. It is called "Senate Report No. 91–501."

I agree that isn't the kind of title which would lead a book to the top of the best-seller list. I can frankly admit that no Hollywood studio has been beating down my door seeking movie rights to it. Yet this book has had the makings of a spectacular because its theme is spectacular—the spectacular failure of our nation to provide its Indian citizens with an equal educational opportunity.

I am a co-author of this book, along with the other eight Senators who comprised the Senate Indian Education Subcommittee. The report is the culmination of more than two years of hearings, interviews and field investigations into the manner in which the American Indian is educated—non-educated may be a better word—in both public and federally-operate schools.

The report, which was released last week, is formally known as "Senate Report No. 91–501." But its theme is more accurately reflected in its subtitle, "Indian Education: A National Tragedy—A National Challenge."

I am not very proud of this report.

Despite the fact that it is the culmination of the most comprehensive study of Indian education ever conducted, I am not proud of this report.

There is little to be proud about a system which sends an Alaskan child 6,000 miles from his home to a boarding school in Oklahoma.

There is little to be proud about a system in which 25 per cent of the teachers of Indian students admit they prefer not to teach Indians.

There is little to be proud about a system which ignores the Indian half the time and demeans him the rest.

The statistics give us some idea of the magnitude of the problem: 50 per cent of all Indian students never complete high school; 40,000 Navajo Indians are functionally illiterate in English; the average educational level for all Indians under federal supervision is 5 school years; Indian graduates of federal schools are academically at least two years behind the average non-Indian high school graduate in the United States.

I could go on and on, but you have heard them all before. In fact, that might be part of the problem. We have heard them so often and for so long that they have lost their meanings.

We can look at a statistic, and two minutes later, have forgotten it. But one cannot forget the loneliness of a 5-year old Navajo boy—a boy who barely came up to my knee—who must live in a boarding school, away from his parents, away from his home. Or the Alaskan children huddled in a small classroom, struggling to understand what their "Dick and Jane" readers mean by "a cow", "a farm", or "green grass". Or the repressive military atmosphere of a Bureau of Indian Affairs boarding school where the principal asked me to look at a passing column of Indian children and "see how happy they are."

I looked at the vacant, expressionless faces. I saw how happy they were. Those are the things one remembers—not the statistics.

It mattered little if we were in BIA schools or public schools. Our findings were basically the same: culturally-insensitive teaching materials; a sometimes well-meant but condescending attitude toward Indians by faculty and administrators; little, if any, influence or control by Indians over the education of their children; and a serious lack of funding for Indian education programs. All these items pointed to one conclusion: Whether being educated in Bureau of Indian Affairs schools or public schools, Indian children were not receiving the same educational opportunities as other students.

We analyzed the problems, consulted with Indians and other outside consultants and discussed the situation amongst ourselves. The result was a report of 60 recommendations—many of them suggested by the Indian people themselves. These are 60 recommendations, which, if implemented, would radically improve American Indian education.

Each of the recommendations is a necessary, essential step if the goal of the Subcommittee—a national policy of educational excellence for the American Indian—is to be achieved. Yet I can't help but feel embarrassed over making these recommendations—embarrassed that in this day of moonwalks and lunar-landings the recommendations we make have to be made at all.

The problems we found were identified years ago.

In 1928 the Meriam Report noted the lack of Indian control over their own affairs and the poor quality of services, particularly in education, available to Indians. The Meriam Report recommended such changes as: the end of taking children from their parents and placing them in off-reservation boarding schools; the development of curriculum materials relevant to the needs and backgrounds of the students; the development of bilingual materials; participation by Indians in school policymaking.

Forty years later these same recommendations run through the Indian Education Subcommittee's report. Forty years after the Meriam study, the situation remains the same.

To those unfamiliar with the manner in which we educate Indian children, some of the recommendations may seem absurd, simply because they are so fundamental to any effective educational program.

We recommend, for example, that locally-elected school boards be established for federal Indian schools so that Indian parents will have some control over the education of their children. This is a concept basic to public school education in the United States, but foreign to the paternalistic Bureau of Indian Affairs.

We recommend that financial need be the major determinant of a student's eligibility for BIA scholarships. To me, that would seem only reasonable. But to the BIA, the nearness of a student's residence to a reservation is the determining factor.

Another "bold" recommendation is that

Johnson O'Malley money—money which is directed by law to be used to service the needs of Indian students in public schools—be used for programs for Indian students. All we are demanding here is that the law be followed. Yet the BIA dispenses these funds indiscriminately, and many public schools use them indiscriminately.

We recommend a National Indian Board of Indian Education to supervise the federal Indian school system in the same way a State Board of Education oversees a State's public schools. We recommend the immediate development of curriculum materials with which the Indian child can identify. We recommend the use of educational approaches, such as bilingual methods, which meet student needs. And most of all, we recommend funding levels appropriate to the need.

These are hardly radical recommendations. But their implementation can radically change the course of Indian education.

I would like to single out one recommendation because of its particular importance.

To many persons, the thought of a Select Committee on the Human Needs of the American Indian immediately raises their hackles. Aha, they say, another study by the white man. Another study in futility.

Well, a Select Committee could be that. But it could be much more.

It could take our shotgun approach to Indian human resource programming and weave education, health, and economics together into a unified policy. These elements cannot be adequately dealt with separately. Each is interdependent upon the other.

In the Indian Education Subcommittee we tried to limit ourselves to our Congressional mandate—Indian education. But we found it impossible to look at the basic problems in education without also touching upon mental health, hunger and malnutrition, unemployment, poverty, etc.

There are presently 86 different statutes which have specific provisions under which Indians can receive federal assistance. This proliferation of programs has led to confusion, overlapping responsibilities, programs working at cross-purposes and a general lack of coordination which can only work to the detriment of the Indian. A Select Committee is needed to give definite direction to a national Indian policy.

Such a Committee would serve significantly as a forum for the Indian people. It would be a place at which their problems would be assured of receiving nationwide attention. The Indian Education Subcommittee has served superbly in this function. No Congressional Committee has probably ever solicited Indian opinion more. Our job was merely to turn those Indian opinions into recommendations.

The Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs provides a good example of what can be accomplished with a concerted effort. A Select Committee on the Human Needs of the American Indian can do just as well.

Now that the Report has been published and the recommendations made, the question can be legitimately asked, What is to keep this report from going the way of all other Indian studies? What is to keep this report from serving primarily as a dust-catcher on the shelf of the public library or as a handy source for a high school student's term paper?

The answer to that question lies in the hands of the Congress, the educational institutions and—most of all—the white society which dominates Indian education.

One of the major reasons Indian education is a national disgrace is because the U.S. Congress has failed the Indian population. Time and time again the Congress has acted irresponsibly and insensititively in its dealings with the American Indian. Its policy toward Indians has varied from extermination to assimilation to isolation to termination. It continually places a higher priority on land and resource policies than it does on the human need programs of Indians.

Our priorities as a nation are confused. Not only does the military establishment drain funds from much-needed domestic programs, but some domestic programs drain funds from human programs. For example, I believe our nation needs a highway beautification effort, but there is something wrong when we can authorize $15 million for pilot programs to find ways to remove abandoned billboards, and yet only appropriate half that amount—just $7.5 million—to develop bilingual programs for Indians, Mexican-Americans and other children who fall behind in school because they do not speak English.

I wish I could promise a dramatic change in the way in which Congress responds to the needs of Indians, but I cannot. But I can promise an effort, a strong effort, to bring about change.

The Indian Education final report has been out a week now, and already we are beginning to see action. Last week the Senate Education Subcommittee accepted two amendments to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act which were offered by Senator Kennedy, Senator Dominick and myself. One is Recommendation 39 of our Report, a change in the law to increase the number of Teacher Corps personnel permitted in BIA schools. The other is Recommendation 46, a change in the priorities of Public Law 815 so that federally-impacted public schools educating Indians will receive priority in school construction funds. Because of their low priority under the existing law, such schools haven't had construction applications filled for almost three years.

These two amendments may not be giant strides, but they are a start. And more Congressional action is coming.

In the near future I will co-sponsor legislation to give two more recommendations the force of law. One bill will authorize the Senate Select Committee on the Human Needs of the American Indian. The other will authorize an Indian-organized and Indian-conducted White House Conference on Indian Affairs. Out of this conference would come detailed policy, legislative and program recommendations which could serve as the blueprint for reform and change over the next generation. It would also give Indians the opportunity themselves to decide if and how the Bureau of Indian Affairs should be reorganized or relocated within the federal structure in order to better meet Indian needs.

The Subcommittee examined this question in depth, and concluded it is an issue the Indian people themselves must decide. We recommend some changes in BIA structure, such as raising the Commissioner to Assistant Secretary of Interior status, but the greater question of whether or not the Bureau should continue within the Department of Interior was left unresolved. A White House Conference of Indians could settle this issue once and for all.

The Congress can therefore make some changes, especially in regard to the Bureau of Indian Affairs. But for the two-thirds of all Indian children who attend public schools, reform is going to have to come at the local level. The federal government can supply money for some programs, but the local institutions will have to take the initiative in making their programs responsive to Indian needs.

Testifying before the Subcommittee, William Penseno of the National Indian Youth Council explained it this way:

"The problem is not with the Indians. They merely react. The problem is with the institutions that service Indians. . . . The institutions that serve Indians were created by man. The Indians were created by God. Surely the institutions are more amenable to change than the people."

You'd never guess that was true judging by the way we educate Indian children.

We somehow have adopted the notion that the purpose of an educational institution is to change the Indian, to have him lose his Indianness and adopt the culture and values of the dominant society. For 400 years we have tried to do this. For 400 years we have failed. The Indian still is an Indian.

We never stopped to ask if maybe our institutions, rather than the Indians, required changing.

"We must stop blaming the Navajo and other Indian children for their failure in education," Senator Robert Kennedy once said. "We must realize it is the educational system we have created that is at fault."

An Indian child enters school already well-nurtured in the language, culture and values of his tribe. He encounters a teacher who knows little about his heritage and less about his language. He is told to disregard his family's teachings and adopt the Great White Way of doing things. Teachers, textbooks and curricula are all programmed to this end.

According to anthropologist Anne Smith: "At home he has learned to be cooperative; at school competitiveness is demanded. At home the value of good inter-personal relations is highly prized; at school individual success above everything is the goal.

"Is it therefore surprising that the Indian student becomes confused?"

The language problem alone is enough to make a child feel like an unwanted alien in a new country.

Dr. Bruce Gaarder, formerly chief of the U.S. Office of Education's modern foreign language section, says:

"The official language policy has kept the Indians in the primitive status of non-literate peoples, and the constant effort to eliminate the differences, forcing each child, in greater or lesser degree, to choose between his own people and the outside world, is nothing less than attempted assimilation by alienation. The language and alienation policies together have effectively prevented the formation of an Indian intelligentsia and have systematically cut away from the tribes most of their potential leaders. The overall result has tended to keep the Indians in a condition of unleavened peasantry."

It becomes the task of educators then, to build upon the cultural strengths a child brings into the classroom, to cultivate in that child a pride in his ancestry and to reinforce, not destroy, the language he natively speaks. The child must be given that sense of personal identification so essential to his social maturation, so essential to his growth in learning.

In all my travels with the Subcommittee there was only one school that seems to be accomplishing this: The Rough Rock Demonstration School on the Navajo Reservation. There an all-Navajo school board supervises an operation which encourages the "Navajoness" of the students. Culturally-sensitive curriculum materials prepared by the Navajos themselves are in use. Bilingual teaching techniques are in operation. Navajo teachers and Navajo aides dominate the school.

It is a rare instance of Indians completely controlling the education of their children. It is a rare ray of hope in the field of Indian education.

There's no reason why there has to be just one Rough Rock. The innovations of Rough Rock can just as well become the standard fare for Chilocco Boarding School or Chemawa or for the Cherokee students of Oklahoma public schools or the Chippewas and Sioux of Minnesota. But it will take a commitment by educators and administrators to stop changing the Indian and begin changing the institution.

Once the dominant society quits treating the Indian condescendingly and paternalistically, once the dominant society cleanses its mind of Indian stereotypes and recognizes the Indian as a human being deserving of a role in school policymaking, once the dominant society stops trying to remake the Indian in the mold of the white man, then progress will begin. Only then will we begin achieving educational excellence for the American Indian.

A lot of time has been lost already. A lot of damage to human beings has already been done. But it is not too late. It's not too late if we listen and believe and commit ourselves to the philopohy which Miss Margaret Nick, a beautiful and articulate Alaskan native, expressed so compellingly to the Subcommittee in Fairbanks, Alaska.

"One thing I know," she said: "is that if my children are proud, if my children have identity, if my children know who they are and if they're proud to be who they are, they'll be able to encounter anything in life. I think this is what education means. Some people say that a man without education might as well be dead. I say, a man without identity, if a man doesn't know who he is, he might as well be dead. This is why it's a must that we include our history and our culture in our schools before we lose it all. We've lost way too much already. We have to move now."

THEY LOWERED THEIR VOICES AND RAISED THEIR STANDARDS

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, all indications were that the Poor People's March on Washington was not as successful as some participants had hoped for.

But an article by the Associated Press from Los Angeles, published in last Sunday's Washington Post, indicates that at least some people profited from their experiences in Washintgon.

The article recounts how a group from the Watts-Willowbrook district of Los Angeles got an idea just from seeing what was called Resurrection City. On the way home from Washington, the people decided to clean up their own neighborhood. And the AP article says this decision has led to success.

The people of the Los Angeles neighborhood had help, in the form of donations of paint and equipment, but the chief ingredients for the success of their project were their own elbow grease and desire for self-improvement.

According to the article, these people made the decision for "no more noise-action." I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRIZES SPUR PAINTING, RENOVATING—RESIDENTS CLEANING UP WATTS

LOS ANGELES.—One day last June the Rev. James Mims and 27 other persons rode a rickety bus home to the Watts-Willowbrook district of Los Angeles from the Poor People's March on Washington.

"An idea was born inside that bus," the 37-year-old Negro minister said. "Or maybe it was more like a dream.

"After seeing 'Resurrection City,' we decided to come back home and brighten the corner where we are. No more noise-action."

Mims and his followers joined forces with the TRY Foundation—a white group founded last May by some prominent members of the Los Angeles cultural community who wanted to improve the area that had been devastated by rioting in August 1965.

Plans were announced for a "Clean-Up, Paint-Up Campaign" in Watts-Willowbrook. Widely distributed circulars promised cash prizes for the best achievements.

The Rev. Mr. Mims, who heads the nondenominational Household of God church, housed in what once was a bookie joint and liquor store, said Watts residents were doubtful at first. "They didn't believe it," he said. "They wondered, 'What's the gimmick?' "

A paint company donated paint for 50 houses. TRY furnished more, along with brushes and rollers, through anonymous contributions.

The morning a truck rolled up with the free paint, people began to believe it, said the Rev. Mr. Mims. "The next day you couldn't drive down the streets—they were filled with junk and stuff the people cleaned out of alleys and garages and yards.

"The whole neighborhood was swinging. Three women painted a two-story house all by themselves. Kids and dads painted while their mothers washed windows. One family painted until 4 a.m. racing other TRY houses on the block."

So far, in less than a month, 90 homes have been painted, trees have been trimmed, blacktop poured for a playground, a garage renovated for a teen center, and plans made for a child care facility and a fund-raising thrift shop.

Prizes are to be distributed in December, when the competition ends.

Said a member of TRY: "We're down there to help and we're down there on a permanent basis. We seek not only money for this work but donations of time, labor and knowledge."

Said the Rev. Mr. Mims: "Each person must have a dream. Then he can have motivation. You have to want to be better. You can't love anybody as long as you hate yourself."

MISUNDERSTANDING OF AMERICA'S FOREIGN AID PROGRAM

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, as a believer in America's foreign aid program, I have often been distressed by the misunderstanding, often purposely pursued by those who oppose the program, which has beclouded this country's efforts to assist other nations in need of help in the name of peace.

In yesterday's Evening Star, columnist David Lawrence wrote of this problem and of the views of Secretary of State William Rogers, who recently appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee to testify on the subject of foreign assistance. Foreign aid is justified, as Mr. Lawrence quotes the Secretary, not only for moral and humanitarian reasons, but also because it is a very important factor in our foreign policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Lawrence's column, which puts forth the position of Secretary Rogers and goes far toward explaining the whole purpose of our foreign assistance program, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREIGN AID ESSENTIAL PART OF POLICY

(By David Lawrence)

"Foreign aid" has become an unpopular phrase in America largely because its critics have spread the wrong impression—that the program is bigger than it really is and that the United States could better use the money at home. But Secretary of State William Rogers points out that the program, in effect, pays for itself many times over.

The administration asked Congress for an appropriation of $2.6 billion. The House cut it by $466 million. The Senate is being asked to restore this sum to the measure. Actually, the amount requested for the entire "foreign aid" program is less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the gross national product of the United States at present. Secretary Rogers feels that such a percentage is only a small part of America's capacity to befriend two-thirds of the peoples of the world.

"Foreign aid" is justified by the secretary of state not only for "moral" and "humanitarian" reasons but because it is "a very important factor in our foreign policy."

He declares that the cut will be viewed abroad as a backward step by America and will lead to a belief that the United States is beginning to turn away from aid programs for the underdeveloped countries.

He says that the effects would be felt in the next few years and that the American aid could have a lot to do with whether "the peaceful revolution in economic and social development now taking place in most regions of the world maintains a satisfactory momentum or not."

It so happens, incidentally, that much of the "foreign aid" given by the United States consists of products or services that are purchased from American companies. The net result, however, is to stimulate ways of building stronger economic systems in each of the countries aided.

The United States is regarded everywhere as a rich country and one able to help the underprivileged. No step has ever been taken in international relations which has won more acclaim for the American people than the "foreign aid" projects. Under the Marshall Plan, which was developed during the Truman administration, the countries hurt in World War II were given a chance to rehabilitate themselves through the use of American funds.

The record of the United States in canceling most of the loans made to the allied powers after both wars and in coming to the rescue even of former enemy countries is unsurpassed in world history.

It is most unfortunate that the same policy was not followed immediately after World War I. Instead, the German people were neglected and they became the victims of Hitler's fascism—an ideology that took advantage of the frustration of the people.

Today the situation is in many respects more acute. The Soviet Union has quietly been using a "foreign aid" device of its own, with large sums spent for military equipment given to North Vietnam as well as the Arabs. There has been some penetration, too, in Africa.

Of course, the example of a Communist-dominated Cuba, with bases for missiles made available to the Soviets, is a not-to-be-forgotten illustration of what can be done by our own potential enemies through the use of their kind of "foreign aid."

It's time the "foreign aid" rendered by the United States was explained fully so that American citizens will not be applauding those members of Congress who want to wreck it but will be warning them instead that the whole project is essential to the carrying out of a successful foreign policy.

The United States has a mission to perform in assisting the countries of Latin America, Africa and Asia to improve their economic facilities so as to be able to handle an ever-increasing population. America can certainly afford more than a quarter of 1 percent of the money taken in by all kinds of businesses and financial operations in what is known as "the gross national product."

Above all, "foreign aid" is a practical policy that could help to prevent another world war by aligning America with other nations everywhere which not only are free but may become strong enough to do their part in preserving world peace.

NO SMOKING, PLEASE

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a persuasive, straight-talking article has come to my attention concerning the dangers inherent in smoking cigarettes.

The author of this piece is Dr. James E. Crane of Stamford, Conn., who is an eminent specialist in aviation medicine.

Dr. Crane's short paper contains the most concise description I have read of what the consequences of smoking can be. His arguments as to why people should not smoke are all too convincing when one considers the fact that most smokers have not yet given up the habit.

The unusual quality of this article, however, is that it also seeks to help the reader understand why he smokes and how he can stop. In order to allow this instructive paper to receive the wide audience which it deserves, I ask unanimous consent that the article, entitled "No Smoking, Please," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO SMOKING, PLEASE

Thanks to the press, radio and TV, we're all well aware of the dangers inherent in smoking cigarettes. Of course not every person who smokes will contract chronic bronchitis or lung cancer or have a heart attack. We've all known heavy smokers who have lived to a ripe old age, none the worse for the habit, and non-smokers whose lives were cut short by coronaries at an early age. But evidence has piled up which shows that the habitual use of tobacco can shorten our lives. "The Health Consequences of Smoking," published by the Public Health Service, reports that a person who smokes two packs or better a day can expect to live 8 years less than a non-smoker, while those who limit their smoking to half a pack daily can lose 4.6 years of their lives.

Although sales of cigarettes in this country have dropped off in recent months, for the first time in many years, as reported in the New York Times, scare psychology has not been enough to convince most people—particularly women and teenagers—that the time to stop smoking is now! Why? Because the problem is being approached from the wrong angle. Isn't it too much to expect people to give up something they find pleasurable—and all too often downright necessary to their sense of well-being—simply out of fear over what may happen to them some time in the future? Not until they realize what the consequences of smoking can be, and understand why they smoke and why they should not, is there any chance of convincing them that continuing the habit may substantially shorten their life span.

WHAT HAPPENS

We're all familiar with the phrase, "Have You Thought About What Happens When You Smoke a Cigarette?" That question really should be "Do You Know What Happens?" For example, did you know that—

Coronary artery disease is the chief contributor to the excess number of deaths of cigarette smokers over non-smokers?

An association exists between cancer of the esophagus, cancer of the bladder, peptic ulcers and cirrhosis of the liver, pulmonary emphysema and cigarette smoking?

Cigarette smoking is the most important cause of chronic bronchitis and a significant factor in the causation of laryngeal cancer?

The causal relationship of smoking a pipe to the development of cancer of the lip has been established?

Amblyopia (dimness of vision) is related to smoking?

Coughing and the production of sputum are more frequent among smokers?

Smokers are far more likely to suffer from gum disease and loss of teeth than are non-smokers?

You don't have to smoke many cigarettes for a very long time before harmful effects show up? As reported in the Boston Herald, a study involving students at San Fernando State College revealed that there were measurable changes in the heart and lungs of the young and healthy student smokers. Also, their blood was found to clot faster. A second study made at the University of California at Santa Barbara disclosed abnormal lung cells suspected of being precancerous in 14.3 percent of the students who smoked.

A close relationship between habitual cigarette smoking and the presence of wrinkled facial skin has been noted by H. W. Daniell, M.D. He finds this a powerful argument in persuading his women patients to give up the habit.

There is a large body of knowledge that should be understood by all smokers. To begin with, in arterio-sclerosis (hardening of the arteries), the blood vessel wall becomes calcified and its calibre diminished. This usually begins at about thirty years of age and may progress slowly or rapidly. If the coronary (heart) vessels are involved, the narrowing of the calibre sets up the pathological state of angina. If there is a total obstruction, coronary thrombosis (heart attack) occurs.

When a cigarette is smoked and inhaled, ½ milligram of nicotine is absorbed into the general circulation. This, in turn, releases a hormone called Serotonin, which constricts the arteries and the veins and dilates the capillaries. Consequently, an obstructive disorder can result which is capable of producing death to the heart muscle due to the loss of blood supply. In addition, a chronic state may develop due to the inability of the heart to pump enough blood to satisfy the needs of the body. Also, sudden death from cardiac arrest or ventricular fibrillation (convulsion of the heart muscle) can take place.

In some people, there is a significant inherited tendency to coronary artery disease. There are also the coronary prone personalities, people who are aggressive and competitive. These are the heavy cigarette smokers who work long hours, take on too many jobs, fight deadlines, seldom exercise or take adequate vacations, and who are obsessed by the lack of time for the performance of their work.

BRONCHITIS AND EMPHYSEMA

Chronic bronchitis and emphysema are non-malignant, non-cancerous diseases of the lungs that disable large numbers of people of working age. Both contribute directly towards premature death. These two diseases frequently coexist, although one can be present without the other.

Chronic bronchitis is a clinical disorder that affects the bronchi (tubes of the lungs). It is characterized by the presence of excessive mucus secretions and a chronic, productive cough. Emphysema, on the other hand, is a disease that affects the air spaces where the gaseous exchange takes place between oxygen and carbon dioxide. Cigarette smoking is the most important cause of chronic bronchitis, and there is a definite relationship between pulmonary emphysema and the consumption of tobacco.

The clinical manifestations of chronic bronchitis consist of (1) cough; and (2) expectoration of mucus. A superimposed infection may also exist and if this is the case, there will also be wheezing.

A knowledge of pulmonary hygiene is necessary in order to recognize the chronic productive cough. In the lining of the airways there are two types of cells. The first are those that continually secrete mucus, so that a carpet of viscous material completely lines the breathing apparatus. It is in this media that foreign particles and the products of cigarette smoke are lodged and enmeshed. The second type are cells with cilia (hair) whose function it is to drive the mucus with its trapped particles upward toward the larynx (voice box) and into the throat.

Cigarette smoke produces alterations in both these types of cells, but particularly in the area endowed with cilia. There is a decrease in the number of ciliated cells, and a shortening in the length of the hair. The failure of the ciliary function to provide a constantly moving stream of mucus enables the foreign particles that are irritant to reach the epithelial lining or cells. The presence of such a constant irritant could produce cancer.

Respiration is the exchange of gas between the air and the blood which takes place in a small pocket of the lung. This pocket is called the alveolus. It has a very thin wall, lined by small blood vessels and supported by connective tissue. It is through this thin wall that the actual exchange of gases takes place. Alteration of the lung, characterized by an abnormal enlargement of the air spaces and destructive changes of the alveolor walls, is known as emphysema. The condition is usually described as an excessive expansion of the "gas exchange area" because of a chronic, increased pressure within the lungs. This expansion crushes the adjacent gas exchanging area and thus diminishes the exchange media. There is also a destruction and loss of the elastic tissue of the lungs which normally forces air out. Consequently, there is an abnormal accumulation of stale air in the lungs.

The symptoms of emphysema consist of shortness of breath, at first only following exertion. Later there are episodes of difficulty in breathing which occur at rest, accompanied by a respiratory infection, due perhaps to exposure to dust, smoke, cold air or damp weather. At night there is apt to be shortness of breath due to the pooling of secretions. This is relieved by cough and expectoration. As the disease progresses, the cough becomes chronic and productive and there are repetitious infections. The victim has a chest that is barrel-like; his/her complexion is bluish and the fingers are clubbed. X-ray of the chest does not always correlate with the clinical state. Forced ventilation may be so impaired that the victim is unable to blow out a lighted match held at close range to the mouth.

CANCER

Cancer of the esophagus, presumed to be due to swallowing smoke which incites irritation, is definitely related to the use of tobacco. It is a known fact that cigarette smoke has immediate as well as long term adverse biological effects on the lungs, blood vessels, central nervous system, esophagus, etc. Volatile factions in the smoke are cytotoxic (poisonous to the cells). Malignant disease of the esophagus is rarely diagnosed early because difficulty in swallowing, pain and loss of weight are late manifestations. The vague, early symptoms such as heartburn are often ignored by either the doctor or the patient and labeled as due to nerves or tension.

Cancer of the lung is a malignant tumor which arises from the bronchial tubes. This form of the disease is increasing more rapidly than other forms. It usually appears in a 55 year old male, a heavy smoker, who complains of cough, spitting of blood, chest pain and weight loss. By the time all of these symptoms are present, it is usually too late. Surgical removal of all tumor-bearing tissue is the only cure for lung cancer, and unfortunately, only 8% of the people who undergo surgery for this disease are alive at the end of 5 years.

Cancer of the larynx is usually seen in males, in their sixties, who have irritated the "voice box" with too much tobacco, too much alcohol and too much talk. The symptoms consist of hoarseness, a sensation of discomfort, tickling or a "lump" in the throat, or pain on swallowing or talking. Later there is halitosis, cough, wheezing, shortness of breath and difficulty in raising secretions. Finally, there are enlarged nodes, and a mass, which is the secondary spread of cancer from the original site (larynx).

There is definitely an association between cigarette smoking and cancer of the urinary bladder. Protein in our food, when ingested, is broken down by the digestive juices and enzymes into amino acids, which are then absorbed in the general circulation. The ultimate fate of proteins and amino acids is disintegration into waste products which are excreted in the urine. There is an amino acid called Tryptophane which, when mixed with the inhaled ingredients of tobacco smoke, is blocked in its ultimate conversion and disintegration into a harmless waste product. At a particular stage or site of blockage, Tryptophane is known to be orthoaminophenal, a cancer-causing metabolite. The Surgeon General's Advisory Committee on Smoking and Health has cited a marked increase in this cancer-causing agent in the urine of cigarette smokers. The Report pointed out that when non-smokers took up the habit, and when smokers who had stopped smoking resumed, there was an average increase of 37% of Ortho-aminophenal in the urine. In some cases, it was as high as 64%. The collection of cancer-causing metabolites in the bladder urine causes an irritation to the lining with the ultimate development of cancer. The symptoms and signs of cancer of the bladder consist of Hematuria (blood in the urine), frequency of urination, urgency and burning. There may also be difficulty in starting the stream. It depends on the type and site of the cancer, whether or not infection is present, and whether or not there are clots of blood in the bladder.

THE HABIT

You know—or you've been told—that you smoke too much and it isn't doing you any good. Your doctor has no doubt suggested that you stop or at least cut down. But you keep right on reaching for a cigarette. Why? You can get a clue from the following motivating or driving forces which Patient Care Magazine lists as being behind the habit.

1. Stimulation. Tobacco in this category keeps you from slowing down. It's a stimulant—a mood elevator.

2. Satisfaction. The cigarette gives simple gratification, both objective and subjective, when rolled between the fingers or shifted to various parts of the mouth.

3. Crutch. The smoker in this category leans heavily on cigarettes during a personal crisis, when he is angry or blue, or under pressure or uncomfortable. In the intervening periods of calm, he feels a negligible call for tobacco.

4. Habit. This smoker no longer enjoys tobacco. He lights up frequently, often without realizing he has done so.

5. Psychological Addiction. This smoker is in serious trouble. He lights a cigarette in the morning as soon as his feet hit the floor, and each one thereafter sets off a cycle of craving for the next one. His body's physical demand is probably less important than the psychologic demand which builds up.

In the writer's personal experience, there are several other psychological factors involved. In addition to being a mood elevator, tobacco causes a pharmacological reaction in which there is an increase in the threshold of cerebral irritability. Smoking a cigarette causes irritation of the mucus membranes. The rolling, rhythmic movement of the facial muscles is soothing and satisfying. In essence, the act of smoking is a conditioned reflex. While some people do smoke for relaxation or merely for the pleasant taste, they are few and far between.

NICOTINE

A cigarette, when inhaled, will invigorate or stimulate as alcohol. Nicotine is the principal alkaloid of tobacco, but its proportion has no connection with the taste of tobacco when smoked. Actually, nicotine is a powerful, rapidly acting poison as we know from its use in agricultural sprays. An overdose may produce giddiness, nausea, vomiting, weakness, rapid pulse, clammy skin, muscle tremors and shortness of breath. These same complaints are often found in heavy smokers.

The physiological action of nicotine is primarily stimulation of the nervous system. If the dose is excessive, there is depression in which every bodily function is involved. The most striking changes are those which take place in the circulatory and digestive organs. The blood pressure rises. Inhibition of hunger contraction occurs, with consequent loss of appetite. (This is the reason why the reformed smoker tends to gain weight). Many of the effects produced by nicotine are similar to those produced by epinephrine (adrenalin). When the dose of nicotine is large enough, it causes a depression, with a fall in blood pressure, rapid pulse, irregular respirations and paralysis of secretions.

MOTIVATION

To better understand the forces that cause you to smoke, answer honestly the following questions which are based on a list published in Patient Care Magazine. How long you've smoked and how much can forecast possible longevity.

1. At what age did you begin to smoke? _____ (Longevity).

2. How many packs of cigarettes do you smoke per day? _____ (Longevity).

3. Do you smoke to keep yourself stimulated? Yes _____ No _____ (Stimulation).

4. Do you smoke for the sense of satisfaction in handling something or of having something in your mouth? Yes _____ No _____ (Handling).

5. Do you smoke only during a personal crisis? Yes _____ No _____ (Crutch).

6. When you run out of cigarettes, is it all but unbearable until you get one? Yes _____ No _____ (Psychological addiction).

7. Are you aware of the fact that you are not smoking? Yes _____ No _____ (Psychological addiction).

8. Do you have a growing hunger for a cigarette when you haven't smoked for awhile? Yes_____ No_____ (Psychological addiction).

9. Do you smoke in the morning before getting out of bed or before you have breakfast? Yes_____ No_____ (Psychological addiction).

10. Do you smoke automatically, without even being aware of it? Yes_____ No_____ (Habit).

11. Do you light a cigarette without realizing you still have one burning in the ashtray? Yes_____ No_____ (Habit).

12. Have you ever found a cigarette in your mouth but can't remember putting it there? Yes_____ No_____ (Habit).

HOW TO TAPER OFF

It's not easy to stop smoking, except for those people who only light up occasionally over coffee or cocktails. No one pretends that it is. It takes will power and sometimes professional help to break the habit.

When you decide to stop, there will be plenty of free advice from well-wishers, some of which you can discount. The non-smokers—except for those who've succeeded in quitting—who tell you, "There's nothing to it—just don't buy any more cigarettes," have no idea what you're up against. If it were that easy, you'd have probably stopped long ago. Also, it's all well and good to get rid of the ashtrays, but your friends may not be as strong-minded as you intend to be and the ashes have to go somewhere.

There are, however, a number of things that anyone can do to give the will power a lift and make the process a little less difficult. Here are a few suggestions, some of which are drawn from the Patient Care article.

1. Taper off. Few people can quit cold turkey. For example, as a start, limit your smoking to alternate half-hours, then gradually lengthen the period to one, two and finally three hours.

2. Allot yourself half the number of cigarettes you're accustomed to smoking per day, and try to leave some unsmoked by bedtime. Then cut to a third and a quarter.

3. Ask yourself, "Do I really want this cigarette?" and put it down; "Why did I light this one?" and put it out.

4. Change your method of smoking. The risk of lung cancer increases with the number of puffs and the time taken to smoke a cigarette. The smoker who puffs rapidly at the end of the smoke is more apt to contract lung cancer than the one who takes several quick puffs when he first lights up. The reason? The shorter the cigarette, the higher the temperature and the higher the concentration of nicotine and tar.

5. When you go out in the car or shopping or for a walk, leave your cigarettes home.

6. Ease up on the amount of coffee and liquor you consume. Both stimulate a desire to smoke.

7. Fight that sudden craving for a cigarette by drinking water, chewing gum or sucking on a piece of hard candy (but watch the calories.) The craving often disappears after 10 minutes or so.

8. Shift from your own brand to one you dislike.

9. Get out of doors and exercise as much as you can—within reason, of course. When your hands are busy gardening, or indulging in some sport or hobby, you can't smoke.

10. Spend as much time as you can in places where smoking is not permitted—museums, movies, etc.

11. Make a bet with someone that you can stop, and put up enough money so that losing will hurt.

12. Visit a chronic lung disease clinic one day, sit in the waiting room and watch the respiratory cripples fight for breath. Yes, it could happen to you.

Inhaling is one of the pleasures of smoking. This can be replaced, at least partially, according to Dr. Ejrupls, by deep breathing. Fill your lungs to capacity and then slowly empty them by keeping the lips partly closed as you exhale. If you are a chain smoker, you probably have an unconscious habit when breathing of hypoventilating or underbreathing. This makes you tense and uncomfortable. You can be retrained in your breathing habits, says Dr. Kaufman, by a simple exercise which consists of first exhaling and then inhaling rhythmically, 16 times per minute. This should be practiced for three minutes, eight or 10 times a day.

For those who have great difficulty in stopping or cutting down on the use of tobacco, try as they will, a doctor can prescribe a variety of drugs that will help during the period of withdrawal. These include Librium (5 mg) to be taken 3 times a day; a combination of Lobeline (5 mg) and Amphetamine (8 mg); or 10 mg. of Methamphetamine HcL, plus 60 Mg. Pentobarbital. There are also several products which can be purchased in a drugstore without prescription, which have proved helpful to many people during this period. And, believe it or not, tobacco may aid in breaking the smoking habit. The variety is Indian (Lobella inflata) Tobacco, sometimes called "asthma weed." The alkaloids from this plant are used as aids to people who wish to stop smoking according to researchers at the University of Mississippi's Institute of Pharmaceutical Sciences.

The psychologically addicted smoker who finds it impossible to stop, but who must stop for reasons of health, may have to be treated in a hospital and placed on heavy sedation or tranquilizers for a period of days or weeks until he is able to cope with the situation himself.

When you come right down to bedrock, it makes very little sense to indulge oneself today without even thinking about what could happen tomorrow. This holds true for overeating, overdrinking, oversmoking—overanything that is potentially harmful to that remarkable machine: the human body. And even if you should be lucky enough to escape all the serious consequences of cigarette smoking, why continue a habit that increases fatigue and nervous tension, and that is known to impair mental efficiency (most school dropouts are smokers, incidentally), memory, muscular power and even sexual capability.

Why not join the "Unhooked Crowd?" You'll look better, feel better and probably live longer. And just think of all the money you'll save!

ADDRESS BY SENATOR EAGLETON

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) has just made a timely and an important speech in San Francisco. It states clearly and forcefully a concern which many Senators have expressed in the last few weeks. I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS F. EAGLETON BEFORE THE DEMOCRATIC STATE CHAIRMAN'S ADVISORY COMMITTEE LUNCHEON, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., NOVEMBER 24, 1969

Last fall, in one of the most poignant scenes of the Presidential campaign, Mr. Nixon noticed a sign held up by a young girl in a train-side crowd in Deshler, Ohio. It said simply, "Bring Us Together."

Mr. Nixon recognized this slogan as an expression of the hopes and desires of a divided nation. It became the theme of his victory speech and his inaugural address—the "great objective" of his Administration.

It is so obvious that the Administration which announced its intention to "bring us together" has decided, as a matter of calculated strategy, to bring some of us together . . . and isolate the rest.

A consistent pattern of statements and events during the last few weeks suggests that the Administration intends to use the force of government not just to rally a majority in support of its policies, but to exclude or suppress the views of those who dissent.

The Administration has resorted to demagogic tactics designed to frighten dissenters from dissenting and, much more dangerous, to whip up fears and hatreds against those who dare to disagree—fears and hatreds that lie very close to the surface in some of our people.

Unable to win dissenters over to its side, the Administration has not merely written them off. It has apparently determined to separate them, if possible, so thoroughly from other Americans . . . to discredit them so profoundly . . . and to frighten them so badly that only one viewpoint will get an airing—the Administration's.

An effort to restrict divergent ideas is dangerous enough in any democracy at any time. But in our own society today, already on edge from the tensions and frustrations of a fast-changing era, a policy of further polarization and division is a tragic betrayal of the responsibilities of leadership.

To encourage political polarization in an attempt to silence dissent is probably more dangerous today than ever before because advances in technology and education have changed the dynamics of dissent. Today public policy is more deeply, more intelligently, and, in most cases, more rationally questioned than at any time in our history—and probably by more people. And attempts to stifle dissent could well lead to turmoil rather than tranquility.

Unless this policy of polarization is recognized and firmly resisted now, we run the risk of slipping into another McCarthy era, this time with the full faith and credit of the U.S. government behind it.

Consider, for example, the transformation in the image of Vice President Agnew. The name-calling—like the "soft-on-communism" charges—which seemed to embarrass both him and the President during last year's campaign, now earns him accolades from Mr. Nixon as a "great" Vice President.

The Vice President's references to "effete snobs" and masochists, and his charge that Senator Edmund Muskie was playing "Russian roulette with U.S. security" when he suggested a six-month suspension of U.S. MIRV testing, were probably spontaneous. But they struck a responsive chord in certain quarters of our society, and the important point is that this kind of talk now clearly has White House approval.

The Vice President's rhetoric is surely no worse than the ranting hyperbole we have heard from some radical quarters during the 1960s. Words like "racist," "imperialist," and "fascist" have seriously degraded American political discourse, even in very sophisticated circles. Perhaps it is not surprising that there should now be a rhetorical reaction in kind. But when such a reaction is officially condoned by the White House, then the entire nation is degraded in proportion.

If Spiro T. Agnew goes down in history as the Great Polarizer, let it be said that he had plenty of help—from above.

The President's November 3 speech on Vietnam, while ostensibly an appeal for unity, presented the people of this nation with a simplistic pair of alternatives: You are either for "peace with honor," which was clearly meant to be equated with whatever President Nixon decides to do, or for a sell-out.

The President said nothing, for example, about the idea that we can only achieve a peace with honor if the Thieu-Ky regime is encouraged to broaden its base enough to earn the support of the South Vietnamese. This is my position, but the President wants me either for or against, and no back-talk.

The President was entirely within his rights in trying to mobilize and demonstrate support for his viewpoint. Certainly, he was entitled to publicize the 58,000 telegrams he received from the "silent majority," even if, from a purely statistical point of view, they compare unfavorably with the 250,000 marchers who came to Washington a week and a half later.

What was troubling, though, was the implicit effort to isolate those who were not for him 100 per cent.

Then there was the Justice Department effort to wrap the recent moratorium marches in violence. There was prior evidence that the Weathermen and others did mean to perpetrate riots at the South Vietnam Embassy and at the Justice Department. Some of the organizers were communists.

But it was also well known that the vast majority of the organizers and the demonstrators intended to march peacefully. To many observers, including this one, Secretary Volpe's November 10 assertion that a "majority" of the organizers were "communists or communist inspired," and the Justice Department's early predications of mass violence, plus the initial refusal to issue a parade permit for Pennsylvania Avenue, looked like calculated attempts to frighten off as many people as possible. This tactic, of course, would not, and did not, discourage those bent on violence. If it kept anyone home, it was those who didn't want violence, were not Communists, but sincerely disagreed with Administration policy.

Two despicable and criminal acts of violence did in fact occur, as the Justice Department's intelligence had predicted. They were committed by a comparative few not connected with the main body of marchers.

Yet the Attorney General announced that the demonstrations as a whole could not be considered non-violent, a statement that was clearly meant to invite the conclusion that all the protesters had contributed to a riot.

Vice President Agnew's attack in Des Moines on the television network news commentators is probably the best example of the effort not just to isolate but also to foment ill-will towards those who disagree with the President. The timing, just before the moratorium . . . the witch-hunt rhetoric . . . the admitted White House participation in its preparation all suggest that it was planned not only to support the President but to still his critics.

The speech contained some truth—as demogoguery must to be effective. The Vice President said that the networks have enormous power over public opinion . . . that commentators sometimes make flash judgments which are wrong . . . that they should make greater efforts to provide balanced coverage . . . and that their viewers ought to let them know it.

Fair enough. Had the Vice President gone only this far, he would have been well within the bounds of legitimate free expression, and deserved credit for having the courage to bite the hand that made him a household word.

But the Vice President did not just criticize the media people; he also tried to discredit them generally to prove that those who criticized the President's speech must ipso facto be wrong.

He held up the network people as a "little group" in New York and Washington—a group apart from and different from the rest of America, irresponsible, sinister, conspiratorial, maybe even un-American.

Not satisfied to single out a body of critics—and remember that they are not all critics and their reporting is not all slanted—the Vice President resorted to the classic tactic of using a single individual as his scapegoat, Ambassador Averell Harriman.

Consider what the Vice President said:

"To guarantee in advance that the President's plea for national unity would be challenged, one network trotted out Averell Harriman for the occasion. Throughout the President's address he waited in the wings. Mr Harriman recited perfectly."

"Trotted" him out . . . Is Mr. Harriman a studio prop at the network to be used to advance its own theories?

"Waited in the wings . . ." When he had been America's chief negotiator in Paris? . . When he had made his position known repeatedly and privately to the State Department and to the President's advisers?

"Recited perfectly . . ." Recited what? The network line? the Communist line? Perhaps just the truth?

The Vice President went on: "He told a little anecdote about a 'very, very responsible' fellow he had met in the North Vietnamese Delegation." Guilt by association? Is the Vice President suggesting that, as chief U.S. negotiator, Ambassador Harriman should not have met with members of the North Vietnamese delegation? . . . Because they were Communists? What were we doing in Paris, then?

Then he said: "A word about Mr. Harriman. For ten months he was America's chief negotiator at the Paris peace talks—a period in which the United States swapped some of the greatest military concessions in the history of warfare for an enemy agreement on the shape of a bargaining table." What concessions? The bombing halt, which had begun some months previously? Did he make these concessions on instructions from our government, on his own? Or, if the bombing halt was wrong or improper, is the Vice President advocating that we renew our bombing?

Let's face it. This was demagoguery, designed not to achieve support for a policy on its merits, but to do it by scapegoating—by isolating and discrediting those who disagree. Perhaps it wasn't the blatant, "Kick 'em in the teeth" demagoguery of Joe McCarthy, but however polished up, however sanitized—it was demagoguery nonetheless.

This tactic assumes a solid majority and an expendable minority. It assumes a country divided can indeed endure.

We can do no better now than to repeat the noble sentiments of the President's inaugural address.

He said we had endured "a long night of the American spirit," and that "to a crisis of the spirit, we need an answer of the spirit."

"To find that answer, we need only look within ourselves.

"When we listen to the 'better angels of our nature,' we find they celebrate the simple things, the basic things—such as goodness, decency, love and kindness. . . ."

To lower our voices would be a simple thing.

"In these difficult years, America has suffered from a fever of words; from inflated rhetoric that promises more than it can deliver; from angry rhetoric that fans discontents into hatreds; from bombastic rhetoric that postures instead of persuading.

"We cannot learn from one another until we stop shouting at one another—until we speak quietly enough so that our words can be heard as well as our voices."

At this point the transcript reads "Applause"—applause which surely reflected the sentiments of the vast majority of Americans—Forgotten, Silent, or otherwise.

Now, ten months later, we find Mr. Nixon's own Administration speaking not to the "better angels of our nature," but to the evil ones . . . not to "goodness, decency, love and kindness" but to fear and hatred . . . not with lowered voice but with the shrillness of the demagogue . . . not in the measured terms of reasoned and compassionate statesmanship, but in the "angry rhetoric that fans discontents into hatreds" which the President himself so rightly condemned.

We find the Administration opening the gates to a tide of unreasoned anger and frustration—the kind of tide that could turn so rapidly into an uncontrollable flood that even the White House won't be able to call it back.

Why the 180 degree change in these ten months? It sounds as if the Administration has lost its nerve . . . lost faith in its original purpose . . . lost faith in the American people.

Whatever the cause, only Mr. Nixon can correct this course. It is time to get on with the difficult work of governing in a democratic context.

STUDENT SEMINARS ON POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. President, the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration is sponsoring on December 29 and 30 a series of student seminars on the problems of pollution and our environment. I congratulate the FWPCA and the Department of the Interior for this most significant effort to involve our youth in the struggle to prevent the contamination of our environment.

Each 7-hour seminar, featuring speakers and participants from FWPCA regional offices, will focus on what is being done and what remains to be done in our national effort to combat water pollution. As Secretary Hickel explains:

We want to tap the enthusiasm, vigor, and fresh ideas of our country's high school and college youth in this battle to protect and preserve our precious and irreplaceable water resources.

The Department has put together a program that involves much more than just a discussion. It also has a plan for the election of regional student advisory groups and a National Student Council on Pollution and the Environment—SCOPE. I am confident that this effort will bring our young people into an active role in the protection of the environment they shall inherit.

Seminars are scheduled on December 29 in Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, Atlanta, Dallas, and San Francisco. The following day seminars will be held in Richmond, Va., Kansas City, Mo., and Portland, Oreg. I hope each will attract a capacity gathering.

Increasingly, the students and young people of our Nation are picking up the cause of environmental enhancment. This trend, I believe, is a most significant and hopeful one. On their enthusiasm alone, we should go far toward a better environment in which to prosper.

This interesting trend, Mr. President, was also discussed at length in a report published recently in the New York Times. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENVIRONMENT MAY ECLIPSE VIETNAM AS COLLEGE ISSUE

(By Gladwin Hill)

LOS ANGELES, November 29—"We want to stop the war, end pollution—and beat Stanford!" yelled a Berkeley pep leader at last weekend's big football rally.

The mention of pollution brought a roar of approval from a University of California crowd of 5,000 that almost drowned out the reference to the big game.

Rising concern about the environmental crisis" is sweeping the nation's campuses with an intensity that may be on its way to eclipsing student discontent over the war in Vietnam.

This is indicated by interviews with students and faculty members from many campuses and with leading conservation authorities around the country.

There is a strong feeling on the campuses that the war will be liquidated in due course. Meanwhile, it is physically remote. And, in the wake of the big protest marches, many students feel Vietnam offers only limited scope for student action.

But the deterioration of the nation's "quality of life" is a pervasive, here-and-now, long-term problem that students of all political shadings can sink their teeth and energies into. And they are doing it.

A national day of observance of environmental problems, analogous to the mass demonstrations on Vietnam, is being planned for next spring, with Congressional backing.

From Maine to Hawaii, students are seizing on the environmental ills from water pollution to the global population problem, campaigning against them, and pitching in to do something about them.

"A ground swell of concern is starting, on everything from population and food supply to the preservation of natural areas," commented Dr. Edward Clebsch, assistant professor of botany at the University of Tennessee.

"I've been floored by the intensity of their actions and feelings," said Dr. Vincent Arp, a Bureau of Standards physicist close to the University of Colorado at Boulder. "The student group is going like a bomb."

"They can see it, they can feel it, they can smell it. And they think they can change it," said William E. Felling, a program officer of the Ford Foundation, which contributes to many conservation activities.

In Los Angeles a fortnight ago, a student bloc stole the spotlight from 1,000 older participants in a gubernatorial environmental conference. Last week in San Francisco, at a meeting of the United States National Commission for UNESCO, something similar happened.

WORDS AND DEEDS

In Massachusetts last week, Boston University students put on a two-day campaign of public education in ecology. In Seattle, the University of Washington Committee on The Environmental Crisis was staging a similar "learn-in".

Words are only the surface of the iceberg. University of Minnesota students, fresh from a mock funeral demonstration against the fume-belching automobile engine, were planning to dump 26,000 cans on the lawn of a beverage manufacturer to protest use of such packaging. Northwestern University students were campaigning against a controversial regulatory proposal of the Chicago Sanitary District, and against the waste discharges of a big drug manufacturer.

At Stanford and the University of Texas, law students were researching new courtroom stratagems against despoilers of the environment. University of Arizona students in semisecrecy, were collecting data on the fume emissions of copper smelting operations.

EFFORTS GET RESULTS

Already the student environmental front can point to many accomplishments. Student activists had significant roles in the campaign to "save" San Francisco Bay and the northern California redwoods, and to block new dams on the Colorado River.

The University of Wisconsin's Ecology Student Association was active in the campaign against the recently truncated Project Sanguine, the Navy's high-power communications development; and provided important logistical support for the Environmental Defense Fund in the months-long Madison hearings on DDT.

At the University of Illinois at Champaign-Urbana, Students for Environmental Control sallied forth in freezing weather 10 days ago and extracted six tons of refuse from nearby Boneyard Creek. They persuaded city officials to follow up the effort, and are working on a beautification plan for the creek.

A University of Texas student is launching a state environmental newsletter. University of Washington students, on their own time, are preparing an 80-page report on ecological problems of Puget Sound. At the California institute of technology, students organized an intercollegiate summer research project in environmental problems that already has attracted nearly $100,000 in foundation financing.

On some campuses—Vassar, the University of Oklahoma, and the University of Nebraska are examples—there are no evidences of organized environmental concern. But they are far outweighed by the ferment elsewhere.

On the University of Texas campus at Austin there are at least six environmental groups, with interests ranging from water pollution to conservation law. One group, in the College of Engineering, has filed 58 formal complaints against the University itself for pollution of a nearby creek. At the University of Hawaii, there are close to two dozen groups, each organized around a particular cause.

ACTION IS KEYNOTE

Some groups, like Boston University's Ecology Coalition have as few as a dozen members. Others have hundreds. But with causes on every hand, mass membership and parliamentary formalities mean less than action, which can be initiated by a handful of people. Then the causes gather their own following.

A few groups cherish the designation of "radical" and are indirect offshoots of the leftist movements like the Students for a Democratic Society and California's Peace and Freedom Party.

"Capitalism is predicated on money and growth, and when you're only interested to maximize profits, you maximize pollution. We need a system that takes maximum care of the earth," said Cliff Humphrey, the 32-year-old leader of Ecology Action, one of several groups at Berkeley.

But generally the aura of the environmental "new wave" is conservative, with coats and ties as conspicuous as beards and blue jeans. "There's a role for everybody in ecology," said Keith Lampe, a cofounder of the Yippie movement, who puts out an environment-oriented newsletter from Berkeley. "People with widely different styles and politics can talk to each other with no more tension than a Presbyterian talks with a Methodist."

FEW "ANARCHISTS"

"I doubt if you'll find many anarchist ecologists," commented Steve Berwick, a 28-year-old Yale environmentalist. "Ecology is a system, and anarchy goes against that."

A typical group is Boston University's Ecology Action, whose 75 members are led by Bruce Tissney, a 20-year-old junior geology major. Edwardian rather than hippie in appearance, he has a trimmed red beard, wire-rimmed spectacles, and affects such sartorial accoutrements as a blue plaid vest and matching bow-tie, white shirt, and gold watch and chain.

Ecology Action's two-day educational program last week included "friendly" picketing of the state capitol, a pollution film festival, pamphleteering and lectures, and a mock award of a pollution prize to a local power company. The group has been conferring with state water pollution officials about doing spare time "watchdog" work, and is planning to set up dust-catching devices to monitor air pollution.

There have, across the country, been incidents, but mostly minor—such as the arrest last month of 26 University of Texas students who tried to block the felling of some trees for a campus building extension.

LOCAL ORIENTATION

Some of the campus groups are branches of national organizations such as the Sierra Club (which has just installed a campus coordinator at its San Francisco headquarters), the Wildlife Federation, and the newly established Friends of the Earth. But most of them are spontaneous local movements. Many tend to shun the established national organizations as being dedicated to old-line "conservation" rather than the environmental crisis. They also feel the older groups are wary of "direct action" for fear of losing the tax-exempt status that is their financial base. Ad hoc student groups don't have this problem.

"We don't want to be labeled as 'conservationists' or 'antipollution'," said Wes Fisher, a 26-year-old ecology student at the University of Minnesota. "Pollution and overpopulation are like a web, and pollution is just the symptom."

The students are employing the gamut of communications and political-pressure techniques—meetings, lectures, rallies, picketing, research, pamphleteering, letter-writing, petitions, legislative testimony, collaboration with public agencies and contacts with politicians.

Last month, Illinois' representative William Springer, Republican, felt student heat when conservationists from the University of Illinois picketed a testimonial dinner for him because he backed a controversial dam project.

IMPETUS IS RECENT

The environmental "new wave" gathered in California as far back as 1965, when Berkeley students staged a sitdown protest against a freeway and Stanford students became involved in campaigns for San Francisco Bay, the redwoods, and Point Reyes National Seashore.

But most of the organizing is recent, and is proceeding unabated. A Boston University group was sparked by a recent Ramparts magazine article by Stanford's Dr. Paul Ehrlich, the "population bomb" crusader. San Francisco State College students were galvanized by a speaker from the Planned Parenthood organization. Bob Hertz, an organizer of the University of Minnesota's Students for Environmental Defense, said his inspiration came from Zen Buddhism and its emphasis on the interrelationship of man and nature. A student group gathering strength at Ohio State was motivated by concern over the Army Engineers' Clear Creek Dam project in southern Ohio, which threatened to flood a pristine natural area used by science students.

In more instances than not, students are welcoming faculty collaboration and counsel. In some places, faculty members have taken the lead. At the University of Arizona in Tucson, a philosophy professor, David Yetman, and a recent law graduate, William Risner, organized "GASP" (Group Against Smelter Pollution) to do battle with the copper companies. The group now includes students and townspeople.

ACADEMIC GROWTH

A University of Illinois engineering instructor, Bruce Hannon, has been a leader of the Committee on Allerton Park, opposing a $70-million Army Engineers dam project near Decatur. Students joined in a campaign that lead to the University's commissioning of an engineering firm to produce an alternative plan.

The environmental ferment caused Ohio State to establish a School of Natural Resources last year. Its original involvement of 180 has grown quickly to 300. An introductory conservation course that had 147 students last fall had 210 this fall. The college's perennial Biologists Forum, which used to draw 20 persons to its meetings, has been attracting hundreds. The University of Tennessee reports an enthusiastic reception for a new course in "Biology and Human Affairs." Colby College in Waterville, Me., has organized two special seminars in January and February on pollution problems and conservation law.

Students are taking the initiative in some environmental teaching. At Stanford, Jeff Bauman, a 22-year-old senior majoring in biology, this fall has been attracting 20 to 40 students to an informal after-dinner dormitory seminar.

OVERSHADOWING VIETNAM

There are differing indications on the campuses about how soon environment may overshadow Vietnam in student interest, but the trend is evident.

"A lot of people are becoming disenchanted with the antiwar movement," said Boston University's Bruce Tiffney. "People who are frustrated with disillusioned are starting to turn to ecology."

"I think environment is a bigger issue than the war, and I think people are beginning to sense its urgency," said Robert Benner, a 22-year-old geology student in the University of Colorado conservation movement.

"The country is tired of S.D.S. and ready to see someone like us come to the forefront," remarked Alan Tucker, a member of Ecology Activists at San Francisco State.

"Environmental problems will obviously replace other major issues of today," said Terry Cornelius, president of the University of Washington's committee on the environmental crises. "The is not just a social movement for Biafra or Vietnam, but for everybody and our closed system, Earth."

"Environment will replace Vietnam as a major issue with the students as the Vietnam phase-out proceeds," commented A. Bruce Etherington, chairman of the University of Hawaii's architecture department. "And it will not be just a political lever to be used by radicals."

Many of the over-30 environmentalists see the student movement as the catalyst, if not the main driving force, that will get environmenal improvement rolling, and overcome the older generation's tacit resignation to the status quo.

"These kids are really remarkable in their understanding and maturity," said 52-year-old Dr. Barry Commoner, the prominent Washington University ecologist who has been addressing many student groups.

Campuses are seen as representing a greatly broadened base for the "conservation constituency" needed to jog bureaucrats and support the politicians through whom environmental reforms generally must clear."

Conservation lawyers look to campuses for the scientific expertise vital in pressing environmental battles in the courts, and for the energy necessary to raise funds for the usually expensive legal proceedings.

Indications are that coming months will see the student conservation tide swelling and manifesting itself in an arresting variety of ways.

Already students are looking forward to the first "D–Day" of the movement, next April 22—when a nationwide environmental "teach-in", being coordinated from the office of Senator Gaylord Nelson, Wisconsin Democrat, is planned, to involve both college campuses and communities.

Given the present rising pitch of interest, some supporters think, it could be a bigger and more meaningful event than the anti-Vietnam demonstrations.

FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION MISTAKES

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, an article written recently by the distinguished Washington Post Reporter Morton Mintz discloses that the Food and Drug Administration is now in the position of certifying as safe and effective a very large number of drugs which, it admits, can cause injuries and death. These drugs include a large number of widely prescribed antibotic combinations which the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences, as a result of a 2-year study for the FDA, recommended be taken off the market in late 1968. Yet, 1 year later, these drugs are still on the market and are still being used widely.

With respect to Panalba, one of the 200 most prescribed drugs in this country, FDA Commissioner Ley told Health, Education, and Welfare Secretary Finch in a memorandum inserted in the hearing record of the Fountain subcommittee of the House that he "cannot certify this drug as safe and effective." The product "has been judged by very competent people not to be effective and to be a hazard to the public health."

The FDA Commissioner said:

We have the right and the obligation to protect the public by requiring its removal from the market and by requiring an appropriate warning to be issued to the doctors of this nation.

Despite the FDA's obligation to protect the public, and although, as Dr. Ley testified, this drug "needlessly injured hundreds of thousands of persons annually and, along with the pen-streps contributed to the possibility of staph epidemics, this agency continues to certify Panalba as safe and effective. In addition, the FDA has not even issued a direct warning to the physicians of our country.

What is especially disconcerting about this whole affair is the political interference by Secretary Finch in matters dealing with the health and welfare of our people. Mr. Mintz describes in detail the unprecedented efforts on behalf of the drug industry by Secretary Finch and Under Secretary Veneman, as documented in the hearing record of the Fountain subcommittee, not only to keep on the market dangerous and ineffective drugs but also to prevent the public and medical profession from finding out about the dangers involved.

I ask unanimous consent that two articles written by Mr. Mintz be printed in the RECORD. I hope that Senators will have an opportunity to read them carefully, because they show how naked and unprotected the public can be when a regulatory agency loses sight, even for a moment, of its function as a protector of the public interest.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC SWALLOWS FDA'S MISTAKES

(By Morton Mintz)

Despite a lot of tough talk, the Food and Drug Administration continues to approve the sale of about 90 widely prescribed antibiotic combinations that, it says, cause needless massive injury and even death.

FDA Commissioner Herbert L. Ley Jr., solidly backed by the National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council, has ruled the medicines unsafe. With full NAS–NRC support, he has also ruled the products ineffective as fixed-ratio combinations. In such combinations, the components are mixed in proportions determined by recipe rather than the individual needs of patients.

Yet month after month, under a court order he has failed to resist, Dr. Ley goes on certifying new batches of the combinations as safe and effective, thus permitting them to remain on sale.

Dr. Ley, himself a specialist in the use of antibiotics to treat infections, has testified on Capitol Hill that one of the mixtures, Panalba, alone causes hundreds of thousands of injuries—a few of them lethal—every year. Other specialists are alarmed at the possibility that widespread, needless use of the combinations may bring worldwide epidemics of infections resistant to treatment.

Yet there is no assured end to the "conflict between commercial and therapeutic goals," as Dr. Ley once described it, in which he goes on certifying the combinations.

A CHARGE OF FEAR

This extraordinary situation has many roots—in the FDA's approach to the broad problem of ineffective medicines, in a series of agency responses to resistance from the drug industry and in attitudes of the medical profession.

But according to two former FDA scientists, the period of transition between the lame duck Johnson administration and the incoming Nixon administration was crucial to FDA treatment of the case. There was, the scientists say, an intuitive fear that if agency leaders took strong action against the combinations, it would bring retaliation from a business-oriented White House.

Dr. Robert S. McCleery, who was Commissioner Ley's special assistant for communications, says bluntly that the commissioner "wanted to keep his job," in which he serves at the pleasure of the President.

Dr. McCleery and Dr. B. Harvey Minchew, who was acting director of the FDA's Bureau of Medicine, were interviewed during an investigation by The Washington Post that turned up hitherto secret aspects of the agency's decision-making processes

They say that a second factor inhibiting the FDA in its treatment of the antibiotic combinations was an uneasy recognition that such a move would focus attention on failures within the FDA itself—starting with a medically unjustified decision a dozen years ago to let the mixtures enter the market.

Thus, Drs. McCleery and Minchew argue, fear abetted by coverup joined to obstruct the FDA from protecting the health and pocketbooks of a vast number of patients.

Dr. Ley and another key figure in the case, J. Kenneth Kirk, associate commissioner for compliance, heatedly deny the charges of fear and cover-up. Kirk concedes, however, that he delayed action on the antibiotics in order to obtain figures on their sales volume (probably $100 million or more a year at wholesale). That was "my idea," he says.

And FDA's counsel, William W. Goodrich, acknowledges in retrospect that had the agency invoked one simple word in the drug law, the subsequent problems might have been substantially minimized if not avoided. The law allows action against drugs posing "an imminent hazard to public health." The agency balked at the word "imminent."

"SHOTGUN" THERAPY

The antibiotic combinations are among the so-called "ethical" drugs, which means that they can be sold only by prescription and cannot be advertised to lay audiences. Their names, therefore, are hardly household words. But in medical channels, including journals distributed free to physicians, they have been long and heavily promoted.

They began entering the market in the 1950s. The FDA released them even though—then as now—specialists in the antibiotic treatment of disease almost universally opposed them.

The main argument in favor of the mixtures has been convenience. This appeal has been especially strong to doctors who wish to be spared the need to make precise diagnoses.

Dr. William L. Hewitt, professor of medicine at the University of California at Los Angeles and chairman of a National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council panel to review drugs, told Sen. Gaylord Nelson's Senate Monopoly Subcommittee last May that the person responsible for FDA's initial approval of antibiotic combinations was Henry Welch, a bacteriologist who in the 1950s headed the agency's Division of Antibiotics.

Dr. Hewitt recalled that Welch had staged symposiums and had engaged in other efforts with an FDA imprimatur to popularize the combinations. This "very bad policy" encouraged "a shotgun approach to the treatment of undiagnosed disease," Dr. Hewitt testified, and he denounced it as "pharmaceutical quackery."

The late Sen. Estes Kefauver developed evidence that Welch got $287,000 from antibiotics producers in an eight-year period, mainly by collecting "honorariums" from two journals whose existence depended upon the antibiotics companies. Welch resigned after the situation was exposed.

However they got on the market, the antibiotic combinations took up an increasing share. Many have been among the 200 most-prescribed medicines. Last year, sales of Panalba—the combination involved in FDA's test case—ran at a rate of $1.5 million a month and accounted for 12 per cent of the domestic gross of the manufacturer, the Upjohn Co.

CASE AGAINST COMBINATIONS

Almost without exception, specialists in the treatment of infectious diseases denounce the use of combinations. They say that the use of two antibiotics when one will do at least doubles the risk of adverse reactions. They also say that fixed ratios prevent a physician from increasing the dose of one component without increasing the dose of the second, thus ruling out treatment tailored to the needs of individual patients.

Panalba, for example, combines two effective antibiotics—novobiocin and and tetracycline. But Dr. Ley has said that novobiocin contributes little but risk to patients receiving tetracycline.

In addition, tests sponsored by the Upjohn firm about a decade ago (but not disclosed until an FDA inspector discovered them in company files this year) showed that the components of Panalba were "antagonistic." That is, novobiocin and tetracycline acted against each other, making one less effective than either would be if used alone.

UCLA's Dr. Hewitt told the Nelson subcommittee that all sales of Panalba thus become "a net theft from the public."

A primary worry among 30 specialists in infectious diseases—members of five panels that reviewed combinations of anti-infective drugs for the National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council—was that the products allow resistant strains of bacteria to proliferate, creating the possibility of epidemics of infections that resist treatment. They recall with dread, for example, staphylococcus epidemics of the 1950s that were nurtured by over-use of sulfonamides and the early penicillins.

Testifying about one group of mixtures, Dr. Calvin M. Kunin, chairman of one of the NAS–NRC panels, told the Senate Monopoly Subcommittee that "widespread" and "indiscriminate" use "has almost led to disaster" by threatening not merely the individuals receiving the drugs but—because of possible epidemics of resistant infections—"all society."

Dr. Kunin, who is chairman of the department of preventive medicine at the University of Virginia, was speaking about 16 combinations of penicillin with streptomycin (pen-streps). The latter antibiotic can cause deafness, particularly in children. An additional 32 products also contain penicillin but mix it with sulfonamides (pen-sulfas).

THE PANELS' VERDICT

Until 1962, the Food and Drug Administration was empowered to get prescription drugs off the market only if they were unsafe. But in that year, Congress passed the Kefauver-Harris amendments, which added regulatory weapons against ineffective drugs as well. Aften seven years, no drug with significant sales has been removed.

The National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council entered the picture in 1966, when the FDA made a contract with it to review the efficacy of the approximately 4,000 formulations marketed in the period before 1962 when safety alone had to be demonstrated before marketing.

Last year, NAS–NRC review panels concluded that the pen-streps and the pen-sulfas were not only unsafe but also ineffective as fixed combinations because none was more efficacious than a component used alone. As to Panalba, the initial conclusion was that it was ineffective and "has no place in rational therapeutics."

Last Christmas Eve the FDA moved formally to take Panalba off the market. The reason given was that the company had not submitted the substantial evidence of efficacy required by the 1962 drug legislation. The agency failed, as had the NAS–NRC panels, to cite a lack of safety.

That failure was surprising. For one thing, the FDA for several years had approved a labeling for the novobiocin component of Panalba warning that it can cause serious and even fatal blood diseases, serious liver damage and allergic or hypersensitivity reactions "in a significant percentage of patients."

FDA Commissioner Ley told Sen. Nelson's subcommittee last May that because of novobiocin, about one out of five patients on Panalba is expected to suffer a "reaction that, most often, is merely irritating . . . you can't sleep for several nights or a week, or you may break out in a very unpleasant, uncomfortable rash."

The FDA's formal notice last December gave Upjohn 30 days to file comments, after which the company could request a hearing.

At roughly the same time, the FDA was working to produce positions on two other major classifications of the antibiotic combinations—the pen-streps and the pen-sulfas—which the review panels had found both hazardous and ineffective.

Testimony before Rep. L. H. Fountain's House Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee last spring established that a document declaring the agency's intention to remove the pen-streps from the market reached the office of Associate Commissioner J. Kenneth Kirk last Dec. 3, and that a similar document relating to the pen-sulfas reached the same office Jan. 10. Both would have been effective upon publication in the Federal Register, and that in turn would have triggered publication in a medical journal of a "white paper" by two NAS–NRC review panel chairmen warning of the hazards of pen-streps and pen-sulfas. Both documents were in final form—awaiting Commissioner Ley's signature—on Jan. 15.

A FINE SENSITIVITY

On that day, Robert S. McCleery remembers, he had a chance encounter with Associate Commissioner Kirk at FDA headquarters in the Crystal Plaza in Arlington. Then Commissioner Ley's special assistant for communications, Dr. McCleery acquired a reputation for tough-minded regulation during his six years at the agency. He holds FDA's award of merit and the distinguished service medal of the parent Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

He was under pressure at the time from the NAS–NRC panels, which wanted to alert the medical profession to the hazards of the pen-streps and pen-sulfas. Since release of the "white paper" designed to do so depended on publication of the Federal Register documents, "Dr. McCleery was on my back," Kirk recalls.

In the Jan. 15 meeting with Kirk, Dr. McCleery recalls inquiring about the regulatory documents involving the pen-streps and pen-sulfas that had been prepared for the signature of Commissioner Ley. Kirk told him, Dr. McCleery says, "I have advised him [the commissioner] not to sign the papers, because he would be fired by the Nixon administration when it comes in next week."

Although there was no evidence that anything of the kind might happen, Dr. McCleery says, there was in the FDA a finely tuned sensitivity to such signals as Mr. Nixon's campaign stance against tough regulation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and to the incoming President's well publicized friendship with Elmer W. Bobst, the "honorary chairman" of a pharmaceutical firm—not, by the way, one involved in the antibiotics combination controversy.

Kirk "categorically" denies making the statement about administration retaliation, and Dr. Ley says Kirk never told him he might be fired by the Nixon administration. Kirk does say that he told Dr. McCleery that the regulatory papers should not go to the office of the HEW Secretary without a prior determination of the sales volume of the questioned antibiotic combination.

THE ECONOMIC IMPACT

Later the same day, Dr. McCleery says, he met with Dr. Ley in his office. Saying nothing about the conversation with Kirk, Dr. McCleery asked the commissioner if he had signed the papers. Dr. Ley said that he had not yet seen them. Later he was to tell the Fountain subcommittee that he had the documents on Jan. 21, the day after the Nixon administration took office.

Eight days later, there was a meeting at the FDA about the possibility of setting up an advisory committee on antibiotics. Dr. McCleery, who says he was "bird-dogging" the matter, requested Dr. B. Harvey Minchew to check on the status of the papers. Dr. Minchew put the question to Deputy Commissioner Winton B. Rankin, the FDA's No. 2 man.

"His answer, in essence, was that we were not going to act on it until the whole potential impact of the antibiotics was brought to the Secretary's attention," Dr. Minchew says. By "impact," he says, Rankin meant "economic impact—the fact that they were best-selling drugs. Anticipating industry resistance, they did not want to implement the action until the Secretary's office had concurred."

At a later date, says Dr. Minchew, Dr. Ley told him "substantially the same thing."

"I can't see that the agency should concern itself . . . with how much is being sold in terms of the medical issues involved," Dr. Minchew says. "It was a disappointment."

Kirk says he is "sorry that Harvey was disappointed." But, the associate commissioner says, there is a long-standing rule that the Secretary's office be alerted to any regulatory action with a potentially great impact.

The Commissioner signed the Federal Register papers on April 2—2½ months after the day when, according to his testimony, they were in his office ready for signature. Publicly, he has never given a clear explanation for the delay. Nor has Kirk given a clear explanation as to how the computation of financial effect could have accounted for the delay.

THE PANALBA DELAY

The Panalba case was undergoing a parallel delay. When he signed the initial notice of intention to take the drug off the market last December, Dr. Ley had given the Upjohn Co. 30 days to file comments. But in January, he extended that deadline to give the firm an additional 120 days. That had the effect of ensuring that any possible decisive action would be taken under the Nixon administration.

Dr. Ley has acknowledged that the extension was "a mistake" because it was used by Upjohn not to supply substantial evidence of Panalba's efficacy but for a campaign to deluge the FDA with testimonials from physicians. An estimated 23,000 doctors have prescribed a reported 750 million doses of Panalba since it went on sale in 1957.

Not all the effects of the delay were in the drug company's favor, however. For by March, Dr. Minchew, as acting director of FDA's Bureau of Medicine, was becoming increasingly disturbed about one of Panalba's components, novobiocin.

In a memo to Dr. Ley, Dr. Minchew cited multiple and serious health hazards of this antibiotic that had been noted by an NAS–NRC panel that recommended its removal from the market. (Dr. Ley had overruled the recommendation, choosing instead to try to restrict novobiocin's use drastically with new warnings to doctors.)

The Minchew memo threatened a crisis for the Upjohn firm. So long as efficacy has been the sole issue raised by the FDA, sales of Panalba could continue unabated while an administrative hearing was sought and held and then litigated in the courts. That would probably take years. But with safety an issue, Upjohn had to face the possibility that sales would be halted immediately.

At the FDA, the Minchew memo became the basis for a crisis of a different kind. After all, the agency had been certifying Panalba as safe and effective for 12 years, batch by batch and month by month.

But Dr. Ley himself—in a draft letter of April 29 to the Upjohn firm—discussed Panalba's "clearly evident imminent hazards . . ." And he testified that it needlessly injured hundreds of thousands of persons annually and, along with the pen-streps, contributed to the possibility of staph epidemics.

How, then, could he fail to take the "imminent hazard" route—a route that, in hindsight, FDA counsel Goodrich says "would have been better?"

Commissioner Ley now concedes that the case for an "imminent hazard" decision might have been made on the basis of serious or fatal blood diseases attributed to Panalba. He contends, however, that the FDA would have faced a severe court challenge because of a lack of records showing that skin and allergic reactions were as prevalent as the agency claimed.

Differing from counsel Goodrich, Dr. Ley insists that, overall, the public health probably was better served by his decision to follow an "intermediate" course. This was to declare Panalba a "serious" or "significant" hazard to patients.

In choosing such a middle ground, Dr. Ley says he was trying to come down between "the Rankins and the Kirks" on the one hand—a reference to the two high-ranking FDA officials who rose from the ranks of agency inspectors and who are known for their bureaucratic caution—and the "Don Quixotes" on the other.

Before Dr. Ley's newly contrived weapon could be tested in court, the commissioner had a struggle within HEW that indicated he could not count on the kind of unequivocal support from Secretary Robert H. Finch that his predecessor, Dr. James L. Goddard, had received from former Secretary John W. Gardner.

The struggle began when Dr. Ley called in the Upjohn firm to say that he was going to announce several decisions. These included halting certification of Panalba as effective and safe, recalling existing stocks and requiring the company to distribute a warning letter to physicians.

Through the intervention of Rep. Garry E. Brown (R-Mich.), whose district includes Upjohn's home city of Kalamazoo, the firm met with Finch and Under Secretary John G. Veneman. The result was that on the day of the meeting, May 5, Veneman took an action without known precedent in the history of antibiotic regulation.

In a phone call to Deputy Commissioner Rankin, Veneman asked the FDA to consider resolving the dispute by taking certain alternative steps. These, it turned out, were the very proposals that Upjohn had made. They included a ban on publicity about Panalba, no recall of existing supplies and an administrative hearing that would allow Panalba to remain on the market without interruption.

The next day, Dr. Ley responded in a memo addressed to Finch that, along with other key documents, was aired by the Fountain subcommittee of the House. Dr. Ley said that he "cannot" certify Panalba as safe and effective. The product "has been judged by very competent people not to be effective . . . and to be a hazard to the public health," Dr. Ley's memo said.

"We have the right and the obligation to move to protect the public by requiring its removal from the market and by requiring an appropriate warning to be issued to the doctors of this nation," Dr. Ley said.

"I recommend that the department endorse and support the action initiated by FDA," he continued. "If the department is unable to accept this recommendation, I request your instructions as to the departmental position that I should follow."

On May 9, three days later, the "departmental position" was relayed to the FDA: to do what Upjohn had asked. But as it happened, that was the very same day that the Fountain subcommittee, preparing for a hearing that was to begin the next week, asked to see FDA files on combination antibiotics.

This request set off a chain of events that included a briefing of Finch by FDA counsel Goodrich. Late in the day, Secretary Finch reversed himself and backed Dr. Ley.

THE UNUSED WORD

With this development, Upjohn moved on May 27 to put Dr. Ley's concept of a "serious" or "significant" hazard to a court test. The firm filed a petition in federal court in Kalamazoo that was intended to keep Panalba on sale through the device of an administrative hearing.

On June 19, the eve of oral arguments before Judge W. Wallace Kent, W. Donald Gray of the Fountain subcommittee staff asked FDA counsel Goodrich in a phone conversation why he was not asserting that an "imminent hazard" existed. Goodrich assured Gray that he had the legal weaponry he needed without that one.

In court on June 20, the Washington lawyer opposing Goodrich—Stanley L. Temko of Covington and Burling for Upjohn; Lloyd N. Cutler of Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering for the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association—emphasized repeatedly that the FDA had not claimed an "imminent hazard."

FDA's Goodrich, using phrases about Panalba that are nowhere in the statute ("unwarranted hazard," "substantial hazard," "unacceptable risk"), argued that the agency had not deemed it necessary to invoke "imminent hazard."

He contended that the FDA had traveled the correct legal route when it first required Upjohn to submit substantial evidence of Panalba's efficacy and then, when such evidence was not forthcoming, refused to certify the product as safe and effective.

Even though Goodrich produced affidavits showing 11 fatalities among Panalba users, Judge Kent was clearly unimpressed. His concern, he said, had to be with legal issues, not issues of safety and efficacy.

In July, Judge Kent held that there was not serious threat to the public health. But, he found, there was a threat of another kind—of irreparable injury to the Upjohn company.

He granted an injunction requiring Commissioner Ley to go on certifying Panalba until 30 days after whatever date he disposed of company objections to the FDA's refusal to grant a hearing.

Sensing a clear industry victory, the American Home Products Corp., whose Wyeth Laboratories division is a major producer of pen-streps and pen-sulfas, swiftly went into federal court in Wilmington, Del., where, on the basis of Kent's ruling, it asked for and got an injunction requiring continued certification of those antibiotic combinations as safe and effective.

The ruling was a shattering setback to the FDA's seemingly interminable efforts to stop the sales of unsafe and ineffective drugs.

By the time Judge Kent ruled, Dr. McCleery had left the FDA to join Rep. Fountain's House Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee as a consultant. After the ruling, he and staff member Donald Gray had a three-way phone conversation with Goodrich. Again the question was, why had the FDA counsel not invoked "imminent hazard?"

As Dr. McCleery and Gray recall the conversation, Goodrich said he still believed he had been on solid legal ground in deciding it was unnecessary to cite the phrase. But, they add, Goodrich also alluded to the tortured record of the FDA in the Panalba case—including the 120-day extension granted by Dr. Ley for Upjohn to file substantial evidence of Panalba's efficacy—and asked, "How could I go into court and charge an 'imminent hazard'?"

Judge Kent's order to continue certifying Panalba posed for Dr. Ley what Dr. McCleery calls "one of the greatest moral challenges" ever faced by a public official.

As a physician and scientist, how could Dr. Ley certify as safe and effective what he had fervently pronounced unsafe and ineffective? As an official of the government, how could Commissioner Ley refuse to obey a court order?

"Above all else," Dr. McCleery argues, Dr. Ley should not have signed certifications for Panalba—"even if it meant resigning." But there was, he points out, an honorable third course: appeal Judge Kent's decision.

Asked why he didn't take it, Dr. Ley says, "I can't really answer this . . . I'm not really sure this course was open to us at this time."

The commissioner adds that he relied on William Goodrich because "I trust Billy as much as I've trusted anyone in my life." He is sure that if an appeal had been "an attractive course, I'm sure I would have followed it."

But Goodrich says he rejected the idea of appealing in favor of what he deemed to be "the shortest and surest way" of getting unsafe antibiotic combinations off the market—ruling on Upjohn's objections to decertification without a hearing. So long as these objections were pending in FDA, Goodrich contends, the chances of a successful appeal would be "not good."

MIDDLE GROUND AGAIN

Commissioner Ley formally ruled that the objections filed by Upjohn offered neither substantial evidence that Panalba was either safe or effective (as a fixed combination) nor reasonable grounds for an evidentiary hearing. "Such a hearing would serve no purpose other than delay," he said in a statement in the Federal Register.

Had Dr. Ley left it at that, he could have stopped certifying Panalba 30 days later as stipulated by Judge Kent. Then the company, if it wished, could appeal. Once again, however, Dr. Ley procrastinated on an invented middle ground.

First, while denying an "evidentiary hearing," he gave Upjohn an opportunity "to make an oral presentation to the commissioner." Second, contrary even to the FDA's own press release, he did not start the clock running on the 30-day moratorium on decertification.

The "oral presentation"—which was as much of a legal novelty as was the "serious," "significant" and "unwarranted" hazard—was held Aug. 13. Five weeks went by in which the FDA continued to certify Panalba—and the pen-streps and pen-sulfas, as well—as safe and effective.

On Sept. 19, Dr. Ley, ruling that nothing in Upjohn's "oral presentation" had changed his judgment, signed a "final order" to take Panalba off the market. But, reversing the position he had taken in May, he did not propose to decertify existing stocks. With this action, the 30-day clock at last began to run.

The Upjohn firm then stopped the clock by filing an appeal in Cincinnati. The FDA "voluntarily agreed to suspend any action against the [Panalba] products pending a decision by the court," The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association Newsletter reported. "The court further noted that the government had not found any 'imminent hazard' to health requiring immediate prohibition of the products' sale, and that in the past these products had been repeatedly certified as 'safe and efficacious' by the FDA."

"INEPT" IS TOO KIND

Sometime in December, the appellate court will hear oral argument on issues that it has termed "very significant both to the public and the drug industry." Sometime after that, the court will rule. Sometime after that, an appeal probably will be taken by the losing party—the FDA or Upjohn—to the Supreme Court. And for an indefinite time to come, the FDA commissioner will go on certifying as safe and effective products that he believes to be neither.

It was with more than a premonition of these events that Dr. McCleery went to Dr. Ley last February to tell him he was leaving.

"I told him I couldn't agree with his kind of regulatory philosophy," Dr. McCleery recalls. "I told him I was seeing evidence that he was handling matters so as to take into account political and economic factors.

"Dr. Ley asked me to stay, to reconsider to take a couple of weeks vacation to think it over," Dr. McCleery says. "I refused."

Dr. McCleery then was retained as a consultant by the Fountain subcommittee, which at the time was preparing for hearings in April and May on how the FDA had been fulfilling its mandate from Congress to halt the sale of ineffective drugs. The hearings showed, Dr. McCleery says, "that the FDA is not upholding the provisions of the law."

After the hearings, Rep. Fountain characterized the FDA's performance as "inept." Dr. McCleery finds that a "complimentary" adjective. As Dr. McCleery sees it, the consequences for the public of the mishandling of the antibiotics will reach far beyond these drugs to vast numbers of ineffective medicines of all types which were marketed before 1962 but which remain among those most often prescribed today.

"How well have the leaders of the FDA served the nation with only the law to protect it in this confrontation with industry self-interest?" he asks. Yet "in these serious and deadly matters, the FDA is our sole agent for the use of law in the protection of public health. If the law can be so misused by some against the government and the public interest, then the law should be employed by others against the government but in the public interest."

Another of the FDA's "Don Quixotes," Dr. Minchew, resigned in May to join the Johns Hopkins Hospital unit in Columbia, Md. "The Rankins and the Kirks," of course, are still there.

In a speech a few months ago, FDA Commissioner Ley defined "the real 'gut' issues of the antibiotic combination controversy" this way:

"Are we in this country dedicated to a rational, scientific basis of antibiotic therapy or are we dedicated to contributing unnecessarily to the 1.5 million hospital admissions annually attributed to adverse reactions to drugs?"

A speech given a few days ago by Dr. Lester Breslow, president of the American Public Health Association, contained a sentence that reads as if it were tailored to give Dr. Ley his answer. In the Panalba case, Dr. Breslow said, "The administrative and judicial action to assure continuing sale was clearly designed to protect the interests of the drug manufacturer, not to avoid the hazard to patients taking the drug."

FDA AND PANALBA: A CONFLICT OF COMMERCIAL, THERAPEUTIC GOALS?

Last month the National Academy of Sciences–National Research Council sent a final report to the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) on its review of the therapeutic claims made for 80 percent of the medicines Americans use. The review—carried out by 30 NAS–NRC panels, each responsible for particular categories of disease—concluded that manufacturers were unable to provide substantial evidence to back up one or more claims made for a significant proportion of the preparations.

Five NAS–NRC panels reviewed anti-infective agents that combine one antibiotic with another in fixed ratios, or an antibiotic with one or more sulfonamides. In addition to finding about 40 such products to be ineffective, by reason of being no more effective than their components used singly, the panels judged at least 50 combinations to be dangerous. The hazard was said to be not merely to the individual user, but to the public at large, because these agents can permit resistant strains of bacteria to proliferate. The mixtures held to be hazardous as well as inefficacious are the "pen-streps" (penicillin and streptomycin), the "pen-sulfas" (penicillin and sulfa), and Panalba (tetracycline and novobiocin).

Panalba is one of the most popular items manufactured by the Upjohn Company of Kalamazoo, Michigan, a prominent member of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association (PMA). It was expected that the FDA, which received the NAS–NRC judgment on Panalba well before the final report on the entire efficacy review was released, would move to take it off the market; and it was predicted by Commissioner Herbert L. Ley, Jr., in testimony on Capitol Hill, that such a move would face a prolonged legal challenge. The FDA did move to take Panalba off the market, and Upjohn did file a lawsuit, in federal court in Kalamazoo.

The Panalba case is significant not only because of its impact on the continued sale of a drug termed hazardous in the NAS–NRC study but because it raises much deeper issues bearing on the "rights" of drug companies, physicians, the government, and patients. The case and congressional criticism have also highlighted what a U.S. senator called "serious ethical questions" on the part of the drug company, a conflict of interest within the American Medical Association, a remarkable flip-flop in FDA enforcement attitudes, and an abortive, late-hour intervention by HEW Secretary Robert H. Finch on behalf of the drug company.

The narrow issue before Judge W. Wallace Kent was whether to grant the petition of the company—which was supported by PMA—for an injunction against the Food and Drug Administration to force the agency to grant an administrative hearing. For Upjohn, the overriding point was its "right" to such an administrative hearing—a procedure which would allow Panalba to remain on the market while the hearing was conducted and the matter perhaps litigated in the courts—and also the "right" of physicians to prescribe as they wish. As for PMA, the lawyer acting in its behalf argued that the FDA had to be prevented from making "an authoritarian official determination of what is good for medicine." He called the Panalba action "truly a test case" both for "the doctors in this country and the drug industry."

[1] Morton Mintz, a reporter for the Washington Post, is author of The Therapeutic Nightmare. For his reporting on thalidomide in 1962 he was awarded the Heywood Broun, Raymond Clapper, and George Polk memorial awards.

The government saw things differently. In court a Department of Health, Education, and Welfare lawyer argued that the case will control "the future of patient care in the United States." And FDA Commissioner Ley said in congressional testimony that the struggle over hazardous and ineffective combinations of antibiotics was at bottom a "conflict between commercial and therapeutic goals."

Judge Kent ruled on 11 July. On the crucial issue of an administrative hearing he held that the company was not entitled to one "as a matter of right." But this defeat for Upjohn—and the industry—was considerably softened. To take one example, the judge said that the FDA could not now stop sales of Panalba (which, in the United States alone, were running at a rate of $1.5 million a month in 1968). Instead, he said, the agency first must act on objections filed by Upjohn to the decision of the commissioner to refuse to certify Panalba as safe and effective. Once the commissioner had acted on the objections (he rejected them on 9 August), he still would be barred from decertifying Panalba for 30 days (after which, presumably, the company could carry the case to a court of appeals that would have to decide whether to allow sales to continue).

The public-interest forces involved in the Panalba struggle were unusually formidable. They included an unbroken rank of medical scientists specializing in the treatment of patients with infections; a strong law that Congress enacted without audible dissent; an agency determined—albeit belatedly—to enforce the law; the NAS–NRC verdict; and the chairman of two actively concerned congressional subcommittees, Representative L. H. Fountain (D-N.C.) and Senator Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.).

The counterforces also were unusually formidable. Predictably they included the PMA, whose members make 95 percent of the prescription drugs sold—and consistently enjoy profit rates higher than those of any other industry, according to Federal Trade Commission records; the American Medical Association, which derives almost half of its income from drug advertising in its Journal; and two leading Washington law firms. Covington & Burling, representing Upjohn, and Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering, representing the PMA. But there was also in the Panalba case the intervention, on the company side, of Robert H. Finch, Secretary of HEW, which was triggered by Representative Garry E. Brown (R-Mich.), of Kalamazoo, and—odd as it may seem, and up to a certain point in time—of the FDA itself.

In defending Panalba the Upjohn Company has ignored invitatons to testify before the interested congressional subcommittees. It preferred a day in court, where lawyer Stanley L. Temko of Covington & Burling warned that a halt in the sale of Panalba would inflict "irreparable injury" on Upjohn. The drug accounts for 12 percent of the firm's domestic gross income.

The PMA had a broader concern: If the sale of Panalba could be halted without the years of delay that might accompany a grant of a hearing, the FDA would have a clear legal track to stop the sale of the pen-streps and the pen-sulfas. In addition, there would be ominous implications for other drugs that, even if not shown to be actually hazardous, had never been shown to be effective—but that nonetheless produce hundreds of millions of dollars a year for the companies that manufacture them.

For many physicians—Upjohn says that 23,000 regularly prescribe Panalba—the stakes were of a different order, having to do with the claim to an unrestricted "right" to prescribe, even if that "right" is founded on advertising, promotion, and other forms of nonscience. Panalba, Temko told Judge Kent, is one of the medicines most often prescribed, and since it entered the market in 1957, he said, 750 million doses have been administered. Indeed, fixed-ratio combinations of one kind or another—including Panalba and the pen-streps and the pen-sulfas—account for 83 (more than 40 percent) of the 200 most popular prescription products.

For patients, the important issues were not profits, wounded egos, or even high prices (Panalba is not sold under a generic name) but a risk of adverse reactions that is at least doubled by the use of two antibiotics when one suffices. "The real 'gut' issues of the antibiotic combination controversy are exceedingly simple," Commissioner Ley said in a speech in February. "Are we in this country dedicated to a rational, scientific basis of antibiotic therapy or are we dedicated to contributing unnecessarily to the 1,500,000 hospital admissions annually attributed to adverse reactions to drugs?" This view was solidly supported in the medical-scientific community. Five NAS–NRC panels, appointed at FDA's request to review all available evidence on the efficacy of anti-infective agents, concluded that mixtures are ineffective as fixed-ratio combinations because none is more effective than its components used separately. In fact, all 30 members of the panels concluded unanimously that these products "no longer belong in the therapeutic armamentarium" and should be removed from the market. The panel chairmen and Dr. Louis Weinstein, author of the "Microbial Diseases" section of the authoritative Pharmacological Basis of Therapeutics, in affidavits filed with Judge Kent, said that scientific literature contains no adequate, well-controlled studies to support the claims made for antibiotic combinations. This is the position held "without exception by the outstanding experts in the antibiotic field," said panel chairman William M. M. Kirby, a professor of medicine at the University of Washington. According to another panel chairman, Dr. Heinz F. Eichenwald of the University of Texas, Dallas, "There are few instances in medicine when so many experts have agreed unanimously and without reservation." None of this was any surprise, because the experts had been denouncing fixed-ratio antibiotic products from the time the FDA allowed them to enter the market, starting almost two decades ago. The combinations, of course, have the appeal of "convenience" to practitioners who prefer "shotgun" therapy to painstaking diagnosis. But such alleged advantages come at the price of preventable injury to patients who get an antibiotic they do not need, or who cannot get enough of a component they do need without also getting more of another potent agent they do not need.

The issues raised by the antibiotic combinations have, with extraordinary clarity, exposed a conflict between profit and principle in the American Medical Association. For at least a dozen years AMA's respected Council on Drugs has condemned fixed-ratio preparations as "irrational." On 16 May, by unanimous vote, the Council endorsed the stand of the NAS–NRC. In 1960 a former chairman of the Council, Dr. Harry F. Dowling of the University of Illinois, told an AMA meeting that none of the antibiotic combinations "is justified." Even as he spoke, the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) was carrying 18 full pages of advertising for antibiotic combinations. In 1961 Dr. Ernest B. Howard, now executive vice president of the AMA, assured the late Senator Estes Kefauver that the Board of Trustees "has reached a decision that the mixtures . . . will be gradually withdrawn from the Journal, during the next two to three years." Although 8 years have gone by, such ads remain abundant in JAMA. At a hearing on 6 May, Senator Nelson wondered if the reason was "that advertising these drugs provides an important source of revenue." Kirby took pains to display two recent full-page ads in JAMA for Panalba, which, he said, are fortified by the "implied endorsement" of the AMA. Early this year, the AMA, which was seeking tax-reform legislation to exempt profits from its ads on the ground that they are "educational," had a choice before it: to continue to run ads that, as Nelson put it, "promote bad medical practice," or to publish a unique "white paper" signed by all five chairmen of the NAS–NRC panels. They were so concerned about their findings that they wanted the medical profession to be alerted by JAMA because of its wide circulation. However, the request to JAMA—made by Duke C. Trexler, executive secretary of the NRC—was, he said, refused "bluntly, flatly," and without explanation by Dr. John H. Talbott, editor of JAMA. The refusal was "indefensible," Dr. John Adriani of New Orleans, chairman of the Council on Drugs, told Senator Nelson. "It boils down to this," he said. "They need every dollar they can get." The New England Journal of Medicine was offered the "white paper" and, on 22 May, published it.

Congressional committees have continued to play a pivotal role in drug politics, particularly by putting pressure on federal agencies. Last March, for example, Roy D. Sanberg, an inspector for the Food and Drug Administration, went to Kalamazoo to search Upjohn's files in the Panalba case. He discovered a series of controlled studies which the company had sponsored in 1960 and earlier. FDA regulations required submission of materials such as these in 1964 and 1966. Nothing was known of Sanberg's discovery until 13 May, when an analysis of them by the FDA's Dr. McQueen was put into the record of a hearing by Representative L. H. Fountain's House Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee. At a hearing of the Senate Subcommittee on Monopoly, Senator Gaylord Nelson said that Upjohn's failure to offer the studies raised "very serious ethical questions." William Goodrich, the FDA counsel, testified that there was a possibility of "regulatory action of a criminal nature." Upjohn's explanation was that "no valid conclusions could be drawn" from the studies.

One of the studies, conducted by Dr. Bennett W. Billow, was a double-blind trial of 50 persons who were moderately to severely ill with pneumonia treatable with tetracycline. Dr. Billow found that Panalba was no more effective that its tetracycline component used alone. Dr. E. L. Foltz conducted four in vitro crossover studies to compare efficacy by measuring blood levels after use of Panalba, novobiocin alone, and tetracycline alone. For Panalba, the results were unfavorable. They showed, Dr. McQueen said, that Panalba produced "lower blood serum levels for both novobiocin and tetracycline than the levels attained by the use of either used alone."

In earlier hearings, Fountain was critical of Dr. Ley, who, on 1 July 1968, was promoted from director of the Bureau of Medicine to FDA Commissioner. The subcommittee probed Dr. Ley's handling of chloramphenicol sodium succinate, the injectable form of the antibiotic most commonly known by the Parke-Davis trade name of Chloromycetin. Fountain was appalled by the FDA's "lack of vigor in protecting the public, and especially children," against the continued marketing of a drug with a labeling recommending sites for injection, the efficacy of which had not been established and which could result in irreparable harm and even death. He told Dr. Ley that his performance in this case "appears to border on indifference." The commissioner has said privately that the hearings turned him into a hard-liner on efficacy, not only because of the sting in the Fountain charge but also because of sharp work by the subcommittee staff that exposed weaknesses in his executive echelons, of which he has been insufficiently aware.

Dr. Ley's performance in the early stages of the antibiotic combination controversy also drew congressional fire. For one thing, despite the urgency felt by the five NAS–NRC panel chairmen about the need to get the "white paper" swiftly before the medical profession, Ley had sat on it for 6 weeks. This period, it must be noted, was one of tense uncertainty because of the transition to the Nixon Administration. For another thing, in what Ley later told me was "a mistake," he granted Upjohn and E. R. Squibb, producer of Mysteclin-F, which, simultaneously with Panalba, had been declared ineffective as a fixed-ratio antibiotic combination, a period of 120 days stop an original 30 to submit "substantial evidence" of efficacy (this was before the safety issue also was raised). The companies used the extra time to solicit almost 3500 letters of support—"testimonials." Ley called them—from the profession. Some of the letters picked up verbatim phrasing suggested by the companies. A number of letters from doctors at the Oak Forest Hospital in Oak Forest, Illinois, were identical to letters from doctors at the Chicago State Hospital. The Maine Medical Association circularized its membership with a paraphrased list of guidelines for letters that had been prepared by Squibb. On 28 January, J. C. Gauntlett, a vice president and director of Upjohn, sent an appeal to doctors to protest to the FDA on the ground that it was violating the physician's right to prescribe." Dr. Hewitt of the University of California, in his appearance before Senator Nelson, denounced Upjohn's "Dear Doctor" letter as an "ill founded, confusing, threatening, and dangerous" method for deciding a scientific issue; as "bold, unscrupulous and selfish"; as "insulting to the intellectual and scientific training of physicians"; and as "detrimental . . . to the practice of medicine as well as to the necessary efforts of regulatory agencies to protect the public from truly unscrupulous promoters." But it may tell us something about the state of the profession to note the number of letters of support the FDA got in comparison with the 3500 "testimonials." The number was ten.

POLITICAL OVERTONES

The controversy had other political overtones. Since January 1967, the Third Congressional District of Michigan, which includes Kalamazoo, has been represented by Garry E. Brown. On 15 May he voluntarily presented himself before the House Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee as a "Congressman-ombudsman" summoned by high duty to protect any constituent—personal or business—that becomes "a victim of the impersonal, remote and awesome structure of the Federal Government." [2] It was in this role of "Congressman-ombudsman," Brown testified, that he had arranged a meeting between a delegation from Upjohn, including its president, Ray T. Parfet, Jr., and its Washington counsel, Stanley Temko, and Robert H. Finch, Secretary of HEW. Finch's involvement had been a surprise disclosure when the hearings opened 2 days earlier.

On 26 March, the Bureau of Medicine formally recommended to Ley that FDA stop certifying Panalba as safe and effective because its novobiocin component created serious risks without commensurate benefits. On 30 April, the commissioner said in a memo to Finch that, at a meeting the next day, he would (and he did) tell Upjohn that FDA was discontinuing certification of Panalba, which would make further distribution illegal; that all outstanding stocks were being decertified and had to be recalled by the company, and that Upjohn would have to send a "Dear Doctor" warning letter about novobiocin and Panalba. The memo was routed through Surgeon General William H. Stewart, Acting Assistant Secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs; whether it reached Finch, who declined to testify, was not established. At the 1 May meeting, Temko attacked FDA's plans as "drastic and shocking." The same day, Ley sent a memo on the meeting to the Secretary.

On 5 May, thanks to the intervention of Representative Brown, the Upjohn forces met with Finch and Under Secretary John G. Veneman. The company's proposals, repeated later in the day to the FDA, were that there be no publicity about the Panalba matter, that a "Dear Doctor" letter not be sent, that certification of Panalba be resumed promptly and that a hearing be granted without interruption to sales of Panalba. Later the same day, Veneman phoned Deputy Commissioner Rankin with an instruction: to "consider" a "possible resolution" that turned out to be identical to Upjohn's own proposals.

"The basic question before us," Ley said the next day, 6 May, in a memo to Dr. Stewart (the commissioner meanwhile had been instructed to stop addressing memos to Finch), "is whether the Government is prepared to move promptly and effectively to stop the use of a hazardous drug when the available facts and the national drug law show clearly Panalba represents serious hazards to patients who take it which are not balanced by any benefit to be expected." The commissioner said that the evidence made it impossible for him to certify Panalba to be safe and effective. He said he could not suppress publicity, as Upjohn had requested, particularly because Senator Nelson and Representative Fountain had scheduled public hearings and "are insisting that when public interest must be weighed against private interest the former should take precedence." As for FDA holding an administrative hearing, Ley said he would grant one, with sales of the drug in question continuing, if the issue is efficacy alone; but in a case such as Panalba's, he said, a hearing would be considered, with certification stopped, only if Upjohn could supply reasonable grounds for holding one— meaning "substantial evidence" of efficacy. If HEW is unable to back him, Ley concluded, "I request your instructions as to the Departmental position that I should follow."

FINCH INTERVENES

The Finch episode came to a climax—or a series of climaxes—3 days later, on Friday, 9 May. At 9:15 a.m., C. C. Johnson, who is Administrator of the Consumer Protection and Environmental Health Service, is Ley's boss in HEW, phoned the commissioner to report that Stewart had approved his recommendations for the course of drastic action against Panalba. Fifteen minutes later, however, William Goodrich, the assistant HEW counsel, phoned with a contradictory message: "The Secretary said we must have a hearing." Although Finch wanted it to be convened "with all possible dispatch," it could take 4 months even to get a hearing under way. Goodrich, who testified that he had acted at the request of Robert Mardian, general counsel of HEW, told the subcommittee that at this point Finch had not seen the 6 May memo in which Ley said that he could not in conscience certify Panalba to be safe and effective.

An hour later, at 10:30 a.m., W. Donald Gray, an investigator for the subcommittee, who was unaware of the events of the preceding 75 minutes, notified the FDA that he wanted to examine its files on antibiotic combinations. He was told the files would be ready for him within an hour. Shortly, however, the FDA informed Gray that there would be a delay because, it was disclosed, Finch had "an unwritten policy that requests from congressional committees regarding 'potentially explosive situations' were to be called to the Secretary's attention." Was President Nixon invoking "Executive privileges," the subcommittee inquired. No such claim was being made. Assistant Secretary Creed Black said—but he was unable to cite a legal basis for refusing to open the files. After lunch, Goodrich testified, Finch was briefed on the situation. The Secretary authorized that the files be opened. Goodrich phoned at 3 p.m. to tell Ley of the decision.

Once the files were examined, subcommittee chairman Fountain told the hearing, it was "apparent that the decision with respect to the marketing status of this drug [Panalba] was made by the Secretary, rather than the Commissioner." This was unprecedented: In the approximately 15 years during which a succession of Secretaries had delegated their power over antibiotic certification to the FDA, none had ever been known to try to prevent a commissioner from acting to protect patients from a serious hazard.

PLANS ENDORSED

At 3:10 p.m., soon after Finch knew that the documents revealing his involvement would be discovered by the subcommittee, he rescinded his earlier order to FDA to leave Panalba on the market while a hearing was being held and endorsed the commissioner's plans for Panalba.

(Finch's defenders claim that he was misled, at the meeting with Upjohn executives and counsel, into believing that the FDA had inexcusably reneged on a promise to hold a hearing. Such a hearing, of course, is available so long as the issue is efficacy alone. But efficacy had been the sole issue in the Panalba case only for a time.)

On 27 May, the Upjohn Company responded by asking Judge W. Wallace Kent for a temporary restraining order and an injunction to stop the Food and Drug Administration from decertifying Panalba without a hearing. In granting the order (after a discussion in chambers) and the injunction the judge constructed a legal structure whose intricacy awed students of food and drug litigation. A primary question was how any court could assume jurisdiction in a case in which the FDA had pending before it, and was required to rule on within 30 days of filing, the company's objections to the agency's declared intention to stop certifying Panalba as safe and effective. Judge Kent answered the question simply by holding that, in issuing the decertification order, the FDA in fact had completed final administrative action. But the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938 says that, when administrative action is completed, a company may carry a grievance to a court of appeals; how, then, could a lower court in Kalamazoo take jurisdiction?

The judge met this situation with a finding that Upjohn was entitled to the extraordinary relief of a preliminary injunction. This finding, in turn, required the company to show that it probably would prevail in the administrative process or on the merits in a judicial review. However, the judge held that the company did not have to show a strong likelihood of success in an administrative process. The basis for this holding was the statement he made repeatedly to counsel, when the case was argued on 29 June, that he was not at all concerned with the issues of safety and efficacy, only with the legal issues. Thus, as the FDA summed up Judge Kent's ruling in a brief filed later in another injunction case, he "refused to recognize" that Upjohn "had been wholly unable to produce" adequate and well-controlled studies to demonstrate the efficacy of a potent drug it had sold for 13 years, and that his injunction would allow the firm to continue to make claims of efficacy which it had not documented. While ignoring the commissioner's explicit finding that Panalba created an unwarranted hazard, and the documentation of unnecessary fatalities in the affidavits, the court was able to hold that an injunction would in no way seriously threaten the public health—but was necessary to avert irreparable injury to Upjohn. Upjohn, the judge said, was entitled to interim relief because it had been placed in "an extremely awkward position" by the refusal of the FDA to divulge the names of the NAS–NRC panelists—"faceless judges." Upjohn lawyer Stanley Temko had called them. The judge rejected the FDA's explanation that NAS–NRC had insisted on anonymity "so to avoid pressures from commercial sources" (8 July, in its final report, NAS–NRC listed the 180 members of all 30 panels). He also said that the commissioner had placed complete reliance on the anonymous NAS–NRC panelists—even though the commissioner said the panel reports were advisory and the final decisions were his alone.

On challenged, intricate legal grounds, a federal judge in Upjohn's home city assumed jurisdiction and allowed the company to go on for more than 3 months selling a product that the NAS-NRC and the FDA found to be a serious hazard and ineffective. In mid-August, it was disclosed that the judge is the unpaid chairman of the Kalamazoo Science Foundation, a charitable organization, half of whose trustees are connected with Upjohn.

It will be recalled that the commissioner, Dr. Herbert L. Ley, Jr., said the conflict over the combination antibiotics was "between commercial and therapeutic goals." If he is correct, the Panalba case reaches a great question of our time: In a struggle between public interest and special interest in which the stakes are needless exploitation, injury, and even death to helpless patients, can American institutions function reliably to protect the public?

NAS-NRC VERDICT ON THE BENEFIT-RISK RATIO OF "COMBINATIONS"

Panalba, the drug at issue in the Kalamazoo court case, is one of the fixed ratio combinations criticized by the NAS-NRC review. The tetracycline component of Panalba is effective against a broad spectrum of infections. The other ingredient, novobiocin, has a spectrum of antibacterial activity conceded by Upjohn to be covered by several other safer and more efficacious drugs. Indeed, a review panel of the NAS–NRC found the benefit-to-risk ratio so lopsided that it recommended removal of novobiocin from the market. The vote on the injectable form was 6 to 0, and on the oral form, 5 to 1. Although the panel said that oral therapy is not indicated in serious infections, the FDA, in May, decided to let novobiocin remain on sale "for those serious infections where other less toxic drugs are ineffective or contraindicated." This new, severely restricted labeling is in a special, boxed warning emphasizing "the rapid and frequent emergence of resistant strains, especially staphylococci," as a risk in the use of novobiocin.

That the same dread threat of "staph" epidemic exists with the "pen-streps" has been emphasized by Dr. Calvin M. Kunin, an NAS–NRC panel chairman who heads the Department of Preventive Medicine at the University of Virginia. The "widespread" and "indiscriminate" use of the pen-streps, he told Senator Gaylord Nelson's Senate Subcommittee on Monopoly, has caused a proliferation of resistant organisms throughout the world and "has almost led to disaster," thus threatening injury "not merely to the individuals receiving such combinations, but to all society." [3]

[3] The NAS–NRC panel on the fixed-ratio penicillin-sulfonamide combinations ("pen-sulfas") said, "Reactions to these drugs are common, and . . . can be severe and even fatal. . . . Another troublesome aspect . . . is that it is difficult to detect the drug causing an untoward reaction when multiple drugs are used." In addition, the panel warned that the pen-sulfas often decrease antimicrobial effectiveness because of antagonism among the components, a problem averted by their separate use as determined by the need of the individual patient.

The boxed warning for novobiocin also warns, on the basis of NAS–NRC findings and FDA's own studies, but with Upjohn's concurrence, of "the high frequency of adverse reactions, including hepatic dysfunction and rashes." In testimony on 27 May, FDA commissioner Ley told the Subcommittee on Monopoly, "Approximately one out of every five patients who receives the novobiocin component of Panalba is expected" to have an allergic or hypersensitivity type of reaction. Most such reactions are "merely irritating," he continued. "You can't sleep for several nights or a week, or you may break out in a very unpleasant, uncomfortable rash." There "must be literally hundreds of thousands" of such reactions a year, Ley estimated. In addition, a "smaller proportion" of Panalba patients "experience temporary but very severe liver damage as a result of the novobiocin component." Finally, he said, "a still smaller number" suffer blood disorders. These accounted for 11 of the 12 fatalities among Panalba users that Upjohn has reported to the FDA. But the agency emphasizes that adverse reactions to all drugs "are grossly under-reported." In the case of the pen-streps, yet another NAS–NRC panel chairman, Dr. William L. Hewitt, professor of medicine at the University of California, Los Angeles, said that, in addition to occasional reports of "dramatic streptomycin toxicity, there are, more importantly, "possible countless instances" of a cumulative, hidden threat to the hair cells in the ear, and thus to the sense of hearing.

Are the hazards posed by Panalba and the penicillin combinations offset by therapeutic advantages? The FDA and the NAS–NRC say they are not. This is all the more troubling because of a report—which first emerged on 13 May in a hearing of the House Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee—that the amount of novobiocin in Panalba is sufficient to do harm but insufficient to do good. The report was made by Dr. Max B. McQueen who, as a medical officer in the FDA's Division of Anti-Infective Drugs, analyzed a series of studies of Panalba that Upjohn itself sponsored but failed to submit to the FDA as required by law, and which were discovered in its files by an agency inspector.

These studies showed that the amount of novobiocin that becomes available in the bloodstream is not only a subtherapeutic dose but is occasionally even zero. McQueen's report was included in an affidavit filed with the federal court in Kalamazoo. In another affidavit, Winton B. Rankin, Deputy Commissioner of the FDA, told of a meeting on 1 May at which Dr. Fenimore T. Johnson, director of product research for Upjohn, admitted—despite the company's claims that Panalba was superior to its components used separately—that the company "had substantiated evidence of the efficacy of novobiocin but not of the combinations."

AFTER KEFAUVER, DRUG CLAIMS TESTED

Until the late 1930's, a manufacturer could market a drug without first being required to demonstrate that it was safe and effective in the uses for which it was labeled. The death of 107 people in the Elixir of Sulfanilamide disaster in 1937 led to the passage of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938. Now, for the first time, manufacturers were required to present premarketing evidence of safety. In 1959, Senator Estes Kefauver, then chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on

Antitrust and Monopoly, began 2½ years of hearings that produced overwhelming evidence of the need for reform legislation, including a requirement for a premarketing demonstration of efficacy. President Kennedy agreed. In March 1962, in his message on Consumer Protection, he said that, of the new single entities listed since 1956 by the American Medical Association's Council on Drugs (which does not list combinations at all), more than 20 percent "were found, upon being tested, to be incapable of sustaining one or more of their sponsor's claims regarding their therapeutic effect. There is no way," he said, "of measuring the needless suffering, the money innocently squandered, and the protraction of illness resulting from the use of such ineffective drugs."

The thalidomide catastrophe rescued Kefauver's reform proposals from oblivion, and, in the fall of 1962, propelled them, as the Kefauver-Harris Amendments, through Congress without a dissent being heard. The efficacy provisions require the sponsor of a drug to provide "substantial evidence," which the law itself defines as consisting of "adequate and well-controlled investigations, including clinical investigations, by experts qualified by scientific training and experience to evaluate the effectiveness of the drug involved." Although the efficacy provisions took effect forthwith for new medicines, a 2-year period of grace was granted for the 1938–1962 products. These include most of the drugs prescribed today—approximately 4000 formulations sold by 237 companies. The FDA directed manufacturers to search their files and report, by September 1964, if these contained information showing that any claim—whether for efficacy or safety—was not warranted by actual experience, and if promotional materials failed to disclose any necessary warning or contraindicated use, along with any side effects or untoward reactions that may have appeared after marketing had begun. In July 1966, with an order published in the Federal Register, the FDA required manufacturers to submit any materials in their files bearing on efficacy to the National Academy of Sciences—National Research Council (NAS–NRC), which, under a contract initiated by the then Commissioner James L. Goddard, was beginning a survey of the effectiveness of the 1938–1962 drugs. Essentially, Goddard felt that only by enlisting the NAS–NRC could he get the job done. His resources within the FDA were extremely limited, whereas, he believed, the NAS–NRC could offer the help of the country's top scientific talent.

THE MEDIA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have received a clipping dated January 23, 1967, from the Jackson, Miss., Daily News quoting David Brinkley of NBC Huntley-Brinkley fame.

The story indicates, in some small way, Mr. Brinkley's philosophy and might offer some insight on how difficult it is for the liberal commentators to be objective when "they report the news."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL TV GIVEN ITS SHARE OF BLAME

GREENVILLE, MISS.—David Brinkley—nationally-known television news commentator—told an integrated audience Saturday night that Mississippi had received some bad publicity "and that television is as much to blame as the so-called northern press."

The statement came in a question and answer session following Brinkley's address to about a thousand persons attending the 51st annual Chamber of Commerce membership meeting.

The newsman was asked his opinion of the state's national image. In a humorous tone he replied that the best law in Mississippi had been changed. "Liquor wasn't on the market, so the prohibitionists were happy. Those who wanted liquor could buy it, and the state got the taxes, and I call that ingenuity," Brinkley said.

On a more serious note he said that Mississippi had been hurt in the last four or five years "but that its image was improving."

He said that it was not just Mississippi that was suffering from racial confusion, but the whole southern quarter of the United States.

"Mississippi has received some unfair publicity and television is as much to blame as the so-called northern press, but in the last couple of years it has become obvious that not only the southern states have not solved the racial problem, but the entire country has not solved it," Brinkley said.

In his address Brinkley said there were people in Washington dedicated to creating a Utopia, a society of perfect peace and prosperity. He said President Johnson is convinced he can bring this about.

Brinkley, an admitted liberal who makes only three or four addresses a year, said "The government can provide a floor and four walls, but you cannot buy equality and happiness, and it cannot be legislated."

At worst, he said, this Utopia would be a dictatorship, and at best it would be dull. "It would be a good place to visit, but you wouldn't want to live there."

The Chamber dinner marked the beginning of many new activities, reorganization, new officers, and the implementation of a newly developed work program "Project 80."

PROGRESS IN PREVENTION OF AIR CARGO THEFT

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, for the past year, as chairman of the Select Committee on Small Business, I have been extremely concerned about the serious and growing problem of theft and pilferage of goods in air commerce. On May 22 and 23 and on July 22, I conducted a full series of hearings on the economic impact of such loss and theft on the small businessman, the major shipper of goods in air commerce. In the very near future, the Small Business Committee will release a report detailing recommendations to assist in combating this type of crime.

During these hearings, it was repeatedly called to the attention of the Small Business Committee that the carriers were delinquent in undertaking even minimal precautions to insure safety of air cargo, and their cooperation with the local police authorities was less than adequate. Today I wish to provide for the RECORD an example of what can be accomplished when an air carrier, Pan American World Airways, and a police department, the New York Port Authority Police, work together to prevent theft and pilferage.

It is significant to note that Pan American World Airways was cited, in testimony before the committee on July 23 by the American Watch Association, as being delinquent in its cargo security. In its defense, Pan Am advised the committee that it was undertaking an extensive review of its security system in order to combat whatever inadequacies that might exist.

I am pleased to report that it appears that Pan American's efforts are paying off. I hope to report soon that improved security by the air carrier industry will not be an isolated example, but universal throughout all airports in the country.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article reviewing Pan Am's success in detail, published in the New York Times of November 27, 1969.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THREE ARRAIGNED IN PLOT TO STEAL WATCHES FROM AIRLINE HERE

Three men were arraigned here yesterday, on charges of trying to steal watches at Kennedy International Airport.

Port of New York Authority policemen arrested them Tuesday while they were trying, the police said, to steal watches and parts valued at $14,000 from a Pan American World Airways cargo shipment.

The men were identified as Heinz Wabnik, 39 years old, of 1681 St. Mark's Avenue, Merrick, L.I.; Michael Sampayo, 45, of 922 Barretto Street, the Bronx, and Jose M. Sanza, 38, of 390 Jackson Avenue, the Bronx.

Because attempted theft in international commerce is a Federal offense, the Port Authority turned the suspects over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The three men were released on their own recognizances after appearing before the United States Commissioner in Brooklyn, pending appearance in Federal Court there.

Mario T. Noto, executive director of Airport Security Council, formed in June, 1968, to help reduce cargo thefts, issued a statement hailing the arrests.

"This is an example of the type of alertness by the Port of New York Authority Police which is helping rid JFK Airport of the stealing and pilferage which is being committed against air cargo," he said.

Mr. Noto held a special meeting June 9 of Government and industry officials to find ways of coping with the increasing theft of imported watches at the airport. He estimated at that time that the value of stolen watches from January to June was $100,000. He noted that watch packages were small and "the smaller the package the more vulnerable it becomes to pilferage."

RETIREMENT OF DWIGHT J. PINION, LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OF THE SENATE

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it is my wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that one of our most skilled professional employees has retired after serving a distinguished career of 27 years in the Office of Legislative Counsel.

Of course, I am referring to Dwight J. Pinion who retired from his position as head of the Senate's legal office on October 31. Some of the new Senators might have missed the opportunity to work with Dwight personally, but I know that word of his excellent reputation has carried to all of us.

When I entered upon my first term as a Senator in the 83d Congress, Dwight Pinion had already been here 11 years. During the 1950's, Senators still made it a usual practice to deal directly with the attorneys in the Senate's Legislative Council, and I can remember that it gave me a great deal of confidence to learn that I could call on the service of professionals such as Dwight Pinion who had many more years of experience in the Senate than I myself did.

This quality of continuity in the service of attorneys is the hallmark of the Senate's legislative drafting office. When Dwight Pinion retired, the average length of service of the 11 attorneys in the office exceeded 16 years. Eight lawyers had been with the office for more than 17 years and five of these individuals had served the Senate for over 21 years.

Mr. President, my major purpose at this time is to commend Dwight Pinion for his outstanding record of aid and advice to individual Senators and several committees. But in so doing, it is impossible to separate the work Dwight performed from the work of the office in which he served. Everything that Dwight Pinion did was done according to his high conception of the role expected of him as a member of the Senate's legislative office.

When he met with requests from nine or 10 Senators at the same time, he handled each politely, competently, and swiftly. We all know that Senators do not want to wait once they have decided to introduce a bill or offer an amendment. Dwight knew this, too, and he respected our right to ask for a measure immediately. He never hesitated by making excuses. He just did the job as soon as he could, which often was the very same day that he was asked to do it.

If this meant that Dwight had to stay at his desk until 10 or 11 at night, or drive in to the office for work on Saturdays and Sundays, then that was what he did.

The point that I am raising is that Dwight Pinion dedicated his mind and skills to serving the Senate in the very best way that he could. His personal standards were extremely high and he fulfilled them in every respect.

Although much of his work had to be done swiftly, it was never rushed. His colleagues tell me that Dwight read and reread all his drafting work, two, three, and more times before letting it go out.

He was constantly guided by the thought of protecting each Senator and the Senate, and the public at large, against any unfortunate applications or interpretations of the bill or amendment which he was asked to write.

Dwight Pinion was a reliable, brilliant, and effective technician. He got the job done when it was needed. He performed his tasks in a dignified, friendly manner. He always made you feel he was eager to help you and enjoyed turning out a professional product. I am told that he was an excellent teacher of the younger attorneys, too, looking to the day when they would have to carry the entire burden of a major field, such as labor law or civil service laws, by themselves.

Mr. President, I believe that I can pay no higher tribute to Dwight Pinion than to say that he exemplified by his career the perfect nonpartisan professional assistant which the Senate had in mind when it created the Office of Legislative Counsel.

The office was established just 50 years ago last February for the purpose of providing the Senate with its own independent staff of lawyers who would possess the highest special competence in the art of drafting and advising on Federal legislation.

Dwight Pinion filled to a tee all the exacting responsibilities which the Senate intended for its legislatve attorneys. His standards and his performance will serve as the model for all lawyers in his office for many, many years to come.

Mr. President, I want to convey my wish—and I am confident that I speak for all Senators—that Dwight Pinion and his wife, Kathryn, will enjoy a long and happy retirement. Blessed as they are with a wonderful family of three daughters and a young grandchild, this should be the easiest chore he has encountered in a long time.

Mr. President, I wish also to express my congratulations to the newly appointed Legislative Counsel, John Herberg. He has assumed this position after a career of 31 years as a Government attorney—the last 22 of which he has been in the Office of Legislative Counsel.

In taking over the reins of the office when it is entering upon the second half-century of its existence, he has quite a challenge facing him. The amount of work done by this small office has grown by leaps and bounds. For example, during the short period of time from the 88th Congress to the 90th Congress, its caseload jumped by 23 percent.

The total number of bills, resolutions, and amendments prepared by Legislative Counsel during the 90th Congress reached an amazing 4,500 pieces of proposed legislation. This is an imposing achievement for a law office consisting of 11 attorneys, and I think it deserves our attention and recognition.

Consequently, I want to extend to John Herberg and the entire staff of Legislative Counsel my best wishes on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of their office and to express my highest commendations for the record of excellence the office has built up over the last five decades. If each member of the office will continue to display the same sense of selfless dedication that marked the career of Dwight Pinion, I know they will be able to handle any challenge that the future may bring.

ADDITIONAL DEATHS OF CALIFORNIANS IN VIETNAM

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, between Saturday, November 22, 1969, and Friday, November 28, 1969, the Pentagon has notified seven more California families of the death of a loved one in Vietnam.

Those killed were:

Sgt. Johnny L. Buriss, son of Mr. Frank A. Buriss, of Oakland.

Sp4c. Barry J. Bedard, son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter M. Bedard, of Canoga Park.

Sp4c. Rory W. Hunter, son of Mr. Virgil W. Hunter, of Covina.

Pfc. William F. Lease, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward O. Lease, of Montclair.

Sp4c. Robert M. Newberg, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Pontello, of Long Beach.

Cpl. Dennis L. Stevens, nephew of Mr. and Mrs. James E. Stevens, of Vallejo.

L. Cpl. Charles D. Yllan, son of Mr. Charles Yllan, of San Jose.

They bring tc 3,891 the total number of Californians killed in the Vietnam war.

POLICY POSITIONS ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL GOVERNORS' CONFERENCE ON EXECUTIVE MANAGEMENT AND FISCAL AFFAIRS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, at the 61st annual meeting of the National Governors' Conference recently, the Nation's Governors discussed and adopted policy positions developed by their six committees concerning the many areas of interest to the States. The Committee on Executive Management and Fiscal Affairs, whose chairman was Gov. Daniel J. Evans, of the State of Washington, recommended policy positions on important issues now being considered by this Congress. Among these are revenue sharing and the taxation of industrial development bonds, subjects of particular concern to me and on which I have introduced proposed legislation.

Other policy positions important to State governments were taken on the taxation of State and local bonds, the interstate taxation of business, the taxation of national banks, and intergovernmental cooperation. These policy positions were unanimously adopted by the Nation's Governors.

I commend Governor Evans for his leadership as chairman of the National Governors' Conference Committee on Executive Management and Fiscal Affairs. Because of the timeliness and importance of these policy positions, I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the policy positions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLICY POSITIONS OF THE NATIONAL GOVERNORS' CONFERENCE

REVENUE SHARING

The National Governors' Conference went on record in 1965 in support of the principle that the federal government share a portion of its revenue with the states, unfettered as to functions for which it is to be used. The Conference reiterates its stand on this matter, and further recommends, consistent with the criteria approved by the Conference in 1968, that a revenue sharing plan be formulated on the following basis:

(1) Congressional appropriations for revenue sharing should be made on the basis of the federal individual income tax base.

(2) Congressional appropriations for revenue sharing should be made to a trust fund established in the Treasury of the United States.

(3) The sums appropriated should be allocated among the states, based primarily on population adjusted by relative state and local tax effort. The relationship between the taxing ability and the percentage of federally-held and administered land acreage in each state should also be considered.

(4) Congress in its appropriations to the states should specify a pass-through formula to local governments. Eighty percent of the monies which are for distribution to local governments should be passed through automatically according to formula to eligible local governments; twenty percent should be passed through to eligible local governments on application of these units to the state, and should be available for programs at the local level which encourage cooperative or joint efforts of local governmental units to solve a common problem.

(5) The federal pass-through formula should provide for sharing revenue only with general purpose units of government.

(6) The allocation by formula should be made to relatively populous cities and counties based on population and the ratio between the total receipts from all taxes imposed by eligible cities or counties and the total receipts from all taxes imposed by the state and its political subdivisions. The portion of any state's allocation which would be available for local governments within the state would depend upon the portion of total tax revenue raised by the state and that raised by the eligible local units in the state. An alternative state allocation plan of distribution should be accepted if (a) each city and county receive an amount equal to or greater than that allocated by formula, or (b) city and county councils or governing bodies representing fifty percent of those entities entitled to receive at least fifty percent of payments by formula concur in the state's alternative plan.

(7) No functions should be excluded from expenditures made from shared funds.

TAXATION OF STATE AND LOCAL BONDS

The National Governors' Conference affirms the basic constitutional principle that neither the federal nor state governments without mutual agreement have the authority to tax the other. The Conference therefore asserts that state and local bonds issued for general governmental purposes must remain tax exempt. The Conference also strongly opposes those aspects of the House-passed Tax Reform Act of 1969 (H.R. 13270) which would adversely affect the marketability of state and local securities and thus the provisions of needed public services and facilities.

INTERSTATE TAXATION OF BUSINESS

For a number of years the National Governors' Conference has expressed opposition to federal legislation which would restrict the taxing jurisdiction of the state and provide preferential tax immunity to favored multistate businesses, and has expressed full support for legislation which would give congressional approval to the enactment of the Multistate Tax Compact by the states.

This conference now goes one step further in supporting an expanded and/or specific version of a congressional consent bill for the Multistate Tax Compact to allay expressions of concern in the Congress that the original consent bill set out only a broad statement of purpose, and to counter claims that the states were seeking a sort of blank check in the area of multistate taxation.

The Conference therefore urges Congress to enact legislation, drafted by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations in collaboration with the Council of State Governments, which incorporates the Multistate Tax Compact and expresses congressional consent to enactment by the states of a compact substantially the same thereto, plus the following additional provisions:

(1) The three-factor formula (Uniform Division of Income for Tax Purposes Act) developed by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State laws is made mandatory for net income taxes upon States which have not enacted the Compact by July 1, 1971;

(2) States are given jurisdiction to require collection of sales tax by sellers making interstate deliveries into a state if the seller makes regular household deliveries there; and

(3) Income taxes may be imposed on congressional salaries only by the district and state represented by the Congressman.

TAXATION OF INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS

The Conference recognizes that so-called industrial development bonds have been used for non-governmental purposes. Unfortunately federal legislation adopted in 1968 to remove the tax-exempt status of industrial development bonds erroneously included in its definition some traditional governmental functions and thus made them taxable under this legislation. The Conference reiterates its 1968 resolution urging legislation properly to redefine industrial development bonds.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS

The National Governors' Conference reiterates its concern, expressed in a policy statement adopted in February, 1969, that action be taken to counteract the effects of court decisions giving an unfair tax advantage to national banks. The Conference urges the adoption of Representative Patman's bill, as amended and reported out of committee (H.R. 7491, Report 91-290), which would allow states to treat national banks the same as state banks for state and local tax purposes.

FEDERAL ROLE IN STATE PLANNING

Planning has always been a vital element in the decision-making process, and in recent years much effort has been made at the federal and state levels to improve the methods by which it is done. The federal government has shown its concern and interest by many programs of assistance to state and local governments for planning. However, many problems have arisen: a multiplicity of planning grants with different federal requirements; uncertain funding; and no integration of plans, especially at the federal level.

The National Governors' Conference urges that:

The Congress and the Administration should take immediate action to correct the confusing, contradictory, duplicative and overlapping mass of federal requirements and definitions concerning both long-range and annual operational plans. Federal agencies should recognize the Governor as the chief state policymaker and planner responsible for the coordination of all statewide and multi-jurisdictional sub-state planning. The elected heads of local government should be recognized in the same capacity for all state and federal programs operating within their jurisdictions.

An appropriate share of the funds of each functional federal grant program should be made available to the Governor for the purpose of relating functional plans to each other, to statewide goals and policies and to local development policies. This effort should begin with HEW which has thirty-nine programs, each requiring a statewide long-range or annual operating plan.

Major federal planning assistance programs should provide for forward funding on a two or three-year basis; minimum annual funding for each state; interprogram service agreements; evaluation machinery; technical assistance, training and tuition fees as eligible project costs; and minimum standardization and coordination of federal planning definitions and requirements.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL COOPERATION

The National Governors' Conference commends the Congress for passage of the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968, which among other things, provides for keeping Governors and legislatures informed of federal grant-in-aid rules and regulations, provides a means to obtain flexibility in administration of the "single state agency" requirement, provides flexibility in state banking of federal funds, authorizes federal agencies to render technical assistance and training services to state and local governments on a reimbursable basis, and provides for federal coordination with local authorities regarding land use.

The Conference urges Congress now to extend the principles of intergovernmental cooperation by enacting legislation which would establish procedures to allow the simplification of accounting, auditing and reporting of federal assistance funds; authorize the President, subject to congressional veto, to consolidate federal assistance programs within agencies; allow joint funding simplification for the packaging of grants for the same or related programs; and provide for periodic congressional and executive review of grant programs to determine their effectiveness.

TRAINING

The growing complexity of state government programs, and of the many intergovernmental programs in which states are involved, is placing an enormous burden upon state officials and employees responsible for the over-all management and unity of state operations. Training is a necessary part of equipping these officials and these employees to carry their burdens.

The National Governors' Conference commends the Council of State Governments for strengthening its training activities: the Conference notes the successful seminar held last December for newly-elected Governors and their aides, the continuing work of the Council and the National Association of State Budget Officers in providing policy-oriented training for budget personnel, the newly established training program for legislators and legislative staff, the recent collaboration with organizations of local officials to provide training on matters of intergovernmental concern, and the scheduled seminar for Governors' aides. The Conference urges further intensification of these efforts.

The Intergovernmental Personnel Act now before Congress should help to strengthen state and local training programs. The Conference endorses the objectives of this Act.

CLEARINGHOUSE FOR STATE CONSULTING HELP

All Governors have on occasion needed the temporary assistance of persons from outside their state governments to bring a different perspective to policy issues as well as to bring to bear technical knowledge and experience in various fields of state government. Although private consulting firms and universities have been used to help provide this assistance, a major reservoir of talent, largely untapped, is the state governments of the Nation. The use of this talent would be of benefit both to the state receiving help and, through broadening the experience of the personnel involved, to the state supplying the expertise.

The National Governors' Conference requests that its Secretariat establish a clearinghouse to enable states to draw upon the experience and talents in the state governments by helping states define their problems with precision and clarity, and identifying employees in state governments who are qualified to provide effective assistance.

HEALTH BUDGET CUTS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, on a number of occasions over the last several months, I have denounced the tragic reductions by the Nixon administration in vital health programs. I will continue to speak out and plan to fight these cuts in the Senate. We need more funds in this area, not less.

One of the more recent announcements by the administration was its decision to terminate the chronic disease programs next year, involving cancer, respiratory ailments, diabetes, arthritis, heart, and stroke, and neurological and sensory disorders.

An example of the tragic implications of this decision which will cause the closings of 19 clinical research centers was brought to light in an article written by Miriam Kass and published in the Houston Post of November 6. One of the 19 clinical research centers which will be closed is the center at the Texas Children's Hospital in Houston.

The story points out that 3-year-old Jamie Cook has been receiving specialized treatment at the center. His mother, Mrs. June Cook, has written to the President:

Mr. President, his life may very well be literally in your hands.

Jamie Cook has biliary atresia, and it is fatal in 95 percent of the cases.

She hopes the President will change his mind about the Federal budget cuts he has proposed, so that Jamie may still be treated at the center. She has my support, and I will fight to reverse this and other health budget cuts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Houston Post, Nov. 6, 1969]

MOTHER PROTESTS HOSPITAL AID CUT—HER SON WAS SAVED

(By Miriam Kass)

Jamie Cook was born with yellow skin.

"It will probably go away soon," the doctor said.

"A month later, when he explained that Jamie might have biliary atresia and it's fatal in 95 per cent of cases—I kind of felt like—like sinking through the floor," says June Cook, his mother.

Yet she was prepared for that moment.

I was 38 when Jamie was born. He's the first child I've given birth to. The doctor said I had about a 20 per cent chance of carrying him.

I would ask myself, What will you do if something is wrong with him?' "

Mrs. Cook, who lives with her family off a country road in Wharton, prayed for her boy.

Now, Mrs. Cook, who believes in action as well as prayer, has written to the President of the United States about Jamie.

"Mr. President," she said, "his life may very well be literally in your hands."

Not that she expects President Nixon to turn healer.

She asks only that he change his mind about federal budget cuts he has proposed. The cuts threaten the existence of Texas Children's Hospital's clinical research center, where Jamie is being treated.

On the day Jamie was 3 months old, doctors at the center examined the delicate insides of the small boy as he lay on the operating table.

"They confirmed the biliary atresia. They told us there was nothing they could do to help, and we could expect Jamie to live probably another four to five months."

Biliary atresia is the absence or closing of ducts that normally drain bile from the liver. "The liver manufactures bile continuously," explains Mrs. Cook, now expert on the subject.

"If there are no ducts, the bile can't get out. It creates pressure. The liver is destroyed."

At surgery it was found Jamie's liver was already half destroyed. The yellow of his skin had deepened, stained by the pigment of bile that could not get out of his body.

Not only did Jamie seem to have no working bile ducts; the surgeon also found there was no connection between his liver and his gall bladder, which normally stores bile for the intestines.

Before he closed up the little body, he did two things. He connected the gall bladder to the liver. And he ran plastic tubes from the liver through an opening made in Jamie's side.

The doctors had no illusion that they would help Jamie's basic problem. At best they figured the tubes would provide the drainage generally needed after any surgery.

But a strange thing happened.

"When Jamie's intestines started functioning after surgery, there was bile in his bowel movement for the first time. It was also coming through the drain in his side.

"He began improving immediately."

Deliberate attempts to create bile drainage in similar cases had failed in the past. Yet here, where doctors had not dreamed they would affect the liver disease, suddenly the liver was draining bile.

To the Cooks it was a miracle.

To the doctors at the clinical research center it was a challenge.

They had a clue.

Microscopic study of a sample of Jamie's liver had shown the liver to be inflamed, infected.

And another clue:

"About the time I got pregnant with Jamie I got a real bad virus," Mrs. Cook recalled.

Usually it is assumed that biliary atresia means the baby is born with no ducts, one doctor says. But in this case, could there have been ducts after all—ducts clogged by infection?

Could that infection have passed into the liver of the developing fetus before his mother even knew he existed?

By chance or by miracle the tubes in Jamie's side may have provided drainage for the infection, allowing the ducts to open, the doctor suggests.

By chance or by miracle those tubes may have been put in just the right place also to carry off the bile from the liver's own ducts.

It's a theory. The doctors at the clinical research center are trying to check it out or to find other explanations for Jamie's apparent escape from death—explanations that might help more babies.

But now the whole biliary atresia study and many others are threatened.

Mrs. Cook admits that "the most active part I've ever taken in government is to vote." Yet she is leading a letter writing campaign to urge the President and congressmen to restore clinical research center funds to the President's budget.

Since his surgery, her baby has had his ups and downs. He is draining a normal amount of bile—half through his side and half through the gall bladder to the bowel.

What will happen tomorrow, no one knows.

Jamie is now 13 months old. He is small, but growing normally, a blue-eyed flirt with sandy hair that stands on end and a big stretch bandage around his middle to secure the dressing over the holes in his side.

And his skin is pink.

WOR–TV ELECTION DAY SPECIAL IN NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, much is being said about "what's wrong" and "what's right with television in our country today. I am pleased to call to the attention of my colleagues and the Nation the 18½-hour election day special presented by a local television station in New York—WOR–TV—as an example of "what's right."

WOR–TV performed a special public service. The station preempted all its programing on Monday, November 3—the eve of election day—and made it available at no cost, for the exclusive broadcast use of the qualified candidates for the offices of mayor of New York City and Governor of New Jersey.

This donation of a full day, 18½ hours—7 a.m. November 3 to 1:30 a.m. November 4—of broadcast time, so that all the candidates and the issues could be made available to the public view, was clearly responsive to the people's need for full, frank, and open discussion and represented a giant step forward to provide programing "in the public interest."

In our society, it is imperative that the electorate have an opportunity to meet the various candidates and to understand their policies. Yet as the populations of our cities and states grow larger and the costs of campaigning continue their upward spiral, it becomes increasingly difficult for candidates to reach all the electorate during a campaign. I believe the unique and important public service offered by WOR–TV should stand as an important example for other local stations as well as for the networks. Such public-service broadcasting is bound to encourage enlightened voting and to permit qualified candidates to seek public office despite limited financial resources.

I wish to record my congratulations to the management of WOR–TV for a fine public service—and for unbiased concern for the important issues of our day. I ask unanimous consent that a press release by WOR–TV as well as an article in the New York Times of November 4, 1969, which describe the special programing, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the press release and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOR/TV TO PROVIDE FREE TIME TO TOP OFFICE CANDIDATES

WOR/TV (New York 9) in an unprecedented public service move, announced today that it will preempt all programming on Monday, November 3 (the eve of Election Day), and made it available at no cost, for the exclusive broadcast use of the qualified candidates for the offices of Mayor of New York City and Governor of New Jersey.

The announcement was made by Edward A. Warren, General Manager of the RKO-General Flagship Station, who has extended an invitation to the candidates by telegram.

The donation of a full day, 18½ hours (7:00 am November 3 to 1:30 am November 4) of broadcast time, in order that the men and the issues be clearly in the public view, said Mr. Warren in making the announcement.

Invitations have been sent to the following four qualified candidates seeking the mayoralty of New York City: Mario Procaccino (Democratic Party: Non Partisan Party: Civil Service Ind.), John V. Lindsay (Liberal: Independent), John Marchi (Republican: Conservative), and Rasheed Storey (Communist Party), John Emanuel (Socialist Labor Party) and Paul Boutelle (Socialist Workers' Party) have been invited to participate on the condition that they become legal candidates for Mayor.

Also, the following seven candidates for Governor of the State of New Jersey have been invited: Robert B. Meyner (Democratic Party), William T. Cahill (Republican Party), James E. Johnson (Independent Party), Jack D. Alvino (Independent Candidate), Julius Levine (Socialist Labor Party), Winfred O. Perry (National Conservative Party), and Louis Vander Plate (Independent).

According to Director of Programming, Mel Baily, the broadcast day will begin at 7:00 a.m. when Ed Warren, as General Manager of WOR/TV, will deliver an introductory explanation of the entire broadcast day. In addition, members of the station's news staff will provide initial commentary as to the forthcoming day's broadcast. The remainder of the day will follow the format below (all times are approximate and subject to change):

(a) 7:30–9:15 a.m. 1¾ hours will be divided equally among the qualified candidates for mayor of New York City.

(b) 9:15–9:30 a.m. The station's reporters will discuss and deliver a wrap-up of the preceding broadcasts by the mayoralty candidates.

(c) 9:30–9:45 a.m. The station's staff, in conjunction with the League of Women Voters and other organizations will present pertinent voting information in both English and Spanish, including the hours of balloting, candidates for various offices and use of the voting machine.

(d) 9:45–11:30 a.m. The next 1¾ hour period will be divided equally among the candidates for Governor of the State of New Jersey.

(e) 11:30–11:45 a.m. Wrap-up of the gubernatorial broadcasts by the station's reporters.

(f) 11:45–12:00 noon. Repeat of explanations of essential voter information and excerpts of the General Manager's opening remarks.

The foregoing schedule is approximately one-quarter of the broadcasting day, the rest of which will be presented in three similarly scheduled segments. In each of the four segments, all of the candidates for both of the offices will receive equal live airtime. Although the public will not be present in the studios, direct telephone lines will be set up for questions to the candidates, to be used at the discretion of the candidates. WOR/TV will provide transportation for all candidates to their studios as well as office and phone facilities for the day at the studios.

This is the first unconditional offer of free airtime by a New York television station in this major political campaign.

The FCC has been advised of this proposal in order to ensure WOR/TV compliance with political broadcast rules.

WOR–TV DEVOTES DAY TO APPEARANCE BY CANDIDATES

(By Fred Ferretti)

In an unusual excursion into political public service, WOR–TV suspended its regular 19-hour daily program schedule yesterday to permit 13 New York City and New Jersey candidates four free television appearances each.

On the day-long program on Channel 9, "Before You Vote," the six candidates for Mayor of New York—four on the ballot and two write-in candidates—and the seven men running for Governor of New Jersey competed for votes, attacked one another, repeated old charges and made some new ones, were sedate and inflammatory, factual and demagogic.

There was only one interruption in the day-long presentation on local politics, when WOR carried President Nixon's address on Vietnam.

WOR's Times Square studios became a motel for the day. Candidates were quartered in various executive rooms and because of their number there was some doubling up. Among the more interesting roommate combinations was that of Rasheed Storey, the Communist party candidate for Mayor, and Jack Alvino, an independent candidate for Governor of New Jersey.

It was a pairing that had the station management a bit apprehensive. Mr. Storey, a Negro, went on at 9 A.M. and asked New Yorkers to "vote for an alternative, for radical change . . . for an end to racism" and for community control of schools.

He finished, went back to his assigned room and pastered the wall around the doorway with Communist party posters. He left, presumably for some breakfast, at about the time Mr. Alvino came in.

The New Jersey independent went before the cameras and said: "Right now the problem were facing is caused by the black man. I am for the colored American, and I said American, 100 per cent. But they must clean up their own race. . . .If the colored want to live like Americans I will hold my hand out to them.

"But if they want to listen to the militants, if they want to live like savages, then they should return to their homeland: Africa—back to the jungles where savages belong."

ROOMMATES DON'T MEET

There are no Storey-Alvino meeting. Mr. Storey came back for three more live appearances. Mr. Alvino let his statement be repeated on tape.

Mayor Lindsay's appearance was smooth and professional. He began his 16½-minute segment with four of his campaign commercials, then he made an appeal for unity. "Of course I care whether I am re-elected," he said, looking into a Teleprompter, "but you have given me something far more gratifying. You have listened.

"It is far more important for a Mayor to be taught by criticism than to be gratified by praise."

Mayor Lindsay, who is seeking re-election on the Liberal and Independent tickets, was given the office of the station's general manager, Edward Warren, for a headquarter.

Controller Mario A. Procaccino, the Democratic and Non-Partisan mayoral candidate, was also subdued. He repeated his several cirticisms of the Mayor in a low voice and said he had "done the best I could to get the message across, even though I couldn't afford Madison Avenue men and television ads." The Controller spoke from cue cards.

State Senator John J. Marchi, the Republican and Conservative mayoral candidate, called Mr. Procaccino a "highly implausible, improbable candidate for Mayor" and said Mayor Lindsay had run a "highly computerized campaign for re-election." Twice Mr. Marchi walked in front of live television cameras, blocking off the Channel 9 commenators, so he could shake hands with the Mayor.

John Emanuel, the Socialist Labor party candidate for Mayor, and Paul Boutelle, the Socialist Workers party candidate, used several of their four rounds for live appearances.

Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Boutelle were on the ballot early in the campaign, but they were forced off when representatives of Mayor Lindsay challenged the validity of their petitions. Both men have been running as write-in candidates since being dropped from the ballot.

Mr. Emanuel said the only solution to the city's social ills lay in voting out capitalism, which he called "out-moded and decadent."

Mr. Boutelle brought guests from the Harlem Community Coalition who described how opposition to the proposed state office building on 125th street has been mobilized.

JERSEY RIVALS APPEAR

Representative William T. Cahill, the Republican candidate for Governor of New Jersey, brought Senator Clifford P. Case with him. Mr. Case said mass transportation in New Jersey was dreadful. Mr. Cahill said he'd improve it.

Robert B. Meyner, the Democratic candidate for Governor, was interviewed in his first appearance by two reporters. The second time around he brought Mrs. Meyner with him as well as Mrs. Richard J. Hughes, the wife of the current Governor of New Jersey.

Mr. Warren, the station manager, estimated that WOR–TV lost $50,000 in commercials for the day, plus whatever the bill comes to for a two-member make-up team, three associate producers, several cameramen, directors and floor managers, and coffee and sandwiches for candidates and lookers-on.

A PLEA FOR RATIFICATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this month the Senate will consider, and hopefully approve, the 1925 Geneva accord that prohibits its signers from first using poison gas in warfare. I urge this body to ratify this accord outlawing on an international level the "first strike" use of these most destructive weapons.

The record of this Nation on this issue has not been exemplary. As far back as 1899, this Nation refused to sign the declaration on the prohibition of gas weapons adopted at the Hague Conference. The use of poison gas by both sides in World War I caused a revulsion in world opinion and many governments sought to outlaw its use in future conflicts. The United States took the initiative in proposing the inclusion of clauses prohibiting the use in war of poisonous gases in the Treaty of Washington in 1922. The treaty was signed and ratified by the United States, but it did not enter into force because France did not ratify. In 1925, the United States proposed to the Geneva Conference on Traffic in Arms, the inclusion of a convention banning the use of gas in warfare. The resulting protocol, which also contained a prohibition on the use of "bacteriological methods of warfare," was signed by the United States. The U.S. proposal had been approved by Army and Navy officials and ratification was recommended by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. But after debate on the Senate floor, which revealed strong opposition by veterans organizations and chemical manufacturers, the treaty was referred back to the committee. In 1947 President Truman withdrew it as one of a group of treaties which had become obsolete.

Let all of us in this Chamber see to it that this time the Geneva accord is ratified. Let all of us see to it that a future President does not find it his responsibility to withdraw this accord since it had become "obsolete."

HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1969

Mr. GOODELL. Mr. President, the conference committee on the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969, S. 2864 and H.R. 13827, will begin tomorrow. My distinguished and able colleagues on the Housing and Urban Affairs Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, the chairman, Mr. SPARKMAN, and ranking minority member, Mr. TOWER, together with Messrs. PROXMIRE, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, MUSKIE, BENNETT, and BROOKE will serve as conferees.

One of the issues extensively considered in the committee hearings on the 1969 housing legislation was the unrealistically low statutory cost limits on Government housing programs. These have caused a delay, and indeed, a halt of Government-subsidized housing construction in many major metropolitan areas of this country.

During the floor debate, I successfully offered amendments to the committee bill which would apply a sliding scale construction cost index to the statutory cost limits of the public housing program and the section 235–236 programs. The committee reported out a provision which applied a base year of 1965 to this construction cost index. Unfortunately, the increase in limits predicated on this base year would have been insufficient to meet the rising construction costs in many of our cities including New York City, Detroit, Boston, Newark, New Orleans, and San Francisco.

My amendments applied the construction cost index from a base year of 1965. This formula will produce adequate cost limits which will reflect actual constructions costs and experience, particularly in our Nation's cities.

At the time these amendments were accepted, concern was expressed by Chairman SPARKMAN and Senator TOWER that the application of the index might itself contribute to rising costs.

I offered to submit additional information on this subject which I did earlier this week in a letter to the chairman. For the benefit of my colleagues, I ask that the text of this letter, which demonstrates the national need for revised cost limits, be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 1, 1969.

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: During the Floor debate on S. 2864, the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969, we participated in a colloquy concerning my amendments which applied a sliding construction cost index (CCI) from a base year of 1965, to statutory room cost and mortgage limits in public housing and FHA-subsidized Section 236–235 housing.

I sincerely appreciated your acceptance of these amendments subject to further clarification that the application of the CCI would reflect the rising cost of housing rather than contribute to inflation and increasing costs.

It is my concern, as it is yours, that the cost of housing be maintained at a level which will be within the financial reach of low and middle income families.

Inflation and rising prices have greatly increased the cost of housing and construction. The Bureau of the Census "Sale Price Index for One Family Homes," which measures the inflationary factors in home building, lists the following increases in construction costs:

	Percent
Total increase	16.0

The Bureau estimates that yearly percentages will increase 2–33 percentage points in following years, barring any drastic change in monetary policy. Conservative estimates for increases for 1968–1969 and 1969–1970 thus would be 9% and 11%, respectively.

For construction of multi-family dwellings and apartments, E. Boeckh and Associates supplies a construction cost index for apartments, hotels, and office buildings. This index shows the following increases:

It has been projected by the Economics Division of the Library of Congress that the index will rise between 2–3 percentage points annually. Thus, the estimates for 1968–1969 and 1970–1971 would be 11.2% and 13.7% respectively.

Cost limits for public housing and Section 236 housing programs are based on 1964 cost statistics. In view of the national increase in construction costs over the past five years, statutory room cost and mortgage limits have made the programs unworkable in our nation's cities, where the greatest increases in construction costs have been experienced.

My amendments, by applying a sale price index to the mortgage limits in the Section 236 program and a nationally recognized construction cost index to the room cost limits in public housing—using a 1965 base year—will make the statutory cost limits reflect construction cost increases.

The House proposal, which would increase these limits by only 10%, is clearly unrealistic. From 1964 to 1968, construction costs have risen on a national basis by 16% for one-family homes and almost 26% for apartment dwellings. By the end of 1969, it can be assumed that these percentages will be at least 18% and 28% respectively, making the 10% increase still more out of date as months pass. The House proposal provides no flexibility for these annual increases in construction costs.

The Committee bill as reported used a 1967 base year for the sliding scale cost limits. In view of the fact that existing cost limits are based on 1964 cost figures, using a 1967 base year would fail to take into account the cost increases that took place during 1965 and 1966. During these two years, costs for one-family homes rose by about 5% and those for multi-family dwellings and apartments rose by almost 9%. Thus using the 1967 base year will fail to recognize about one-third of the cost increases that have taken place since 1964.

I am enclosing for your information a letter I have received from Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York City. In this letter, he points out:

(1) That under existing cost limits, construction of public housing and Section 236 housing is virtually stopped;

(2) That under the Senate bill's cost limits, using the 1965 base year, the City can proceed with its plans to build 6,000 new public housing units and 8,700 Section 236 units;

(3) That under the Committee bill's cost limits, using the 1967 base year, only 1,000 of these public housing units and 3,000 of these Section 236 units would be built.

I do not believe the increases as proposed in my amendments will cause inflation; rather the index will reflect changes in construction costs. Under the sliding scale formula, the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development is authorized to adjust the cost limits by the percentage increase in the previous year. Therefore, the adjustment in 1970 will be based on the average construction cost index for 1969. The formula will reflect the changes of the previous year, and there will be a year's lag between actual cost experience and adjustment of cost limits by the Secretary.

Concern has been expressed that increased cost limits will become "floors" rather than "ceilings" and that subsequently, lower and middle income families will be unable to afford the increased cost of housing.

The plain fact is that, with existing cost limits, housing cannot be built in the numbers necessary to fill the demand.

I have already detailed the problem that the existing cost limits present for New York City. Similar problems are found to exist in cities throughout the nation.

In a study sponsored by the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials, HUD regional officials reported that over 80 cities are encountering difficulties in the construction of public housing under present cost limits.

Detroit, Michigan, which has experienced a 50% construction cost increase since 1965, has been unable to build any low income units since 1953. In March of 1967, bids for 140 units were submitted, totalling $3,519,890 while the statutory limit called for a total of $2,116,501.

Memphis, Tennessee, which is not a HUD high cost area, recently had to reject a bid for a 183 unit high rise apartment building because the sum was 15% over the allowable cost limits.

Dallas, Texas, which has experienced a cost increase of 819% over the past year, was unable to build two high rise projects for elderly because the bids submitted were 12.7% over the allowable limit.

York, Pennsylvania, is unable to construct public housing due to a 31% increase in bid estimates between June, 1968, and April, 1969.

It has been pointed out that, in the case of Section 236 projects, construction cost increases may lead to rent increases. This can be true. By refusing to adjust outmoded cost limits, however, we do not solve this problem. We only prevent 236 housing from being built.

I would point out that it is the public housing and Section 236 programs—not the Section 235 program and conventional FHA mortgage programs—that have been facing the most severe problems with existing cost limits.

The sliding scale provisions as adopted by the Senate using the 1965 base year now apply not only to public housing and Section 236 housing, but also to Section 235 and conventional FHA-insured mortgages. I would consider it acceptable, if you think this to be desirable, to restrict the application of the sliding scale using the 1965 base year to public housing and Section 236 programs.

Section 15(5) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 sets forth two criteria which must be satisfied if the Secretary is to apply an additional increase of 45% to public housing room cost limits in high cost areas. They are:

(1) That is it not feasible under cost limits to construct projects without sacrifice of sound standards of construction, design and livability;

(2) That there is an acute need for housing in the area.

It might be desirable to add a provision requiring the Secretary of HUD to apply the same criteria in exercising his authority under the Senate bill to increase cost limits on the basis of cost increases.

It is my hope that this information will be helpful to you in the conference committee next week. My staff is at your disposal should you have further questions.

Sincerely,

CHARLES E. GOODELL.

THE DRIVE FOR EQUAL RIGHTS—ADDRESS BY LEON E. PANETTA

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, as a Senator who is firmly and unequivocally committed to our national goal of equal opportunity for all Americans, I was glad to note a similar commitment in a recent statement by an administration spokesman in the area of civil rights.

In a speech before the National Civil Liberties Clearing House last month, Leon Panetta, Director of the Office for Civil Rights at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, said:

Desegregation is right, desegregation under law is necessary, and desegregation is a current imperative job—for every single agency of the United States Government . . .

Mr. President, I believe that Mr. Panetta's remarks should be of interest to all Senators. I ask unanimous consent that his speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DRIVE FOR EQUAL RIGHTS: YESTERDAY, TODAY—AND TOMORROW?

(By Leon E. Panetta, Director, Office for Civil Rights, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare)

I must tell you that it is an honor to be asked to speak before so many who have done so much in the struggle to bring equal opportunities to all Americans. Although I am a relative newcomer to the arena, I have had the opportunity to work with many of you in the battles fought on the Hill and on the plains of Pennsylvania Avenue. In spite of the title of my talk, I realized so well before I came here that you are the ones who are most familiar with yesterday, and it would be a presumption for me to dwell on it.

Instead, I intend to talk more about the current product of the practices of the past, some of the steps forward that have been taken, and the urgent need for a revival of the civil rights spirit today. For although the laws are now on the books, the spirit of the law remains to be implemented. Most of all, I want to tell you some of what I see coming or threatened in the next year or two, and my hopes for your help in coping with tomorrow.

If government has learned one lesson today, it is that the Federal government cannot shirk its duty to all citizens as dictated by the Bill of Rights and the 14th Amendment, as well as by decency and by the inherent duty of government. I feel that my agency and sister Washington agencies have definite obligations, and I shall enumerate some of them. You have some excellent opportunities to carry forward your work, and I may mention some new areas in which I will need your assistance.

One public figure who played a large role in developing my beliefs on civil rights and whom I believe many of you may know was told by his principal campaign advisor last year that "civil rights is dead." The campaign manager meant, of course, that nobody was talking about civil rights in 1968, that it was a moribund if not stone-cold dead issue, and that anybody who dwelt on the subject would be considered irrelevant if not foolhardy, and would certainly lose an election. Well, that public figure was proud of his civil rights record, he talked about it, and he did lose.

Did that prove that civil rights was dead? No, it did not. It proved that the subject had been eclipsed in 1968 by the war, by the fear of riots, by crime statistics and by economic advancement, as opposed to social or other progress of minority groups. Civil rights was not a popular subject, but it was not dead. Surely, the passage of the Equal Housing Law was proof enough of that fact.

But, in 1969, it seems to me, civil rights has become again an issue of profound concern to millions of Americans. It is of profound concern to you and to me, and I would like to see where we can move together to advance the cause.

In discussing the past briefly, it is only necessary to mention the recent ruling by the Supreme Court, to evoke a capsule history of the forward movement of civil rights under law. As it unanimously stated last week, the standard of allowing "all deliberate speed" for desegregation is, in the words of the Court, "no longer permissible."

"Deliberate speed," when coupled with the historic 1954 Supreme Court Decision outlawing so-called separate but equal school facilities, turned out to be a password for delay. It held forth a promise and a hope, it inspired numerous and sometimes successful civil rights efforts, but it also permitted delays and disappointments which seem inexcusable to most of us today. School desegregation cases in many cities of the South which were filed over ten years ago are continuing today, as glaring examples.

Finally, in 1964, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act which declared in part that no Federal funds would go to school districts and other organizations or activities which continued to discriminate. Then it took the 1965 Elementary and Secondary Education Act to provide the massive Federal school aid, which convinced many school districts that they had good reason to begin doing what the Supreme Court ordered 11 years earlier, in order to acquire and retain these funds.

And now, the Supreme Court has spoken again, and, where the state-imposed dual school system is concerned, we hope decisively and finally. The order of October 29 settled for once and for all the question of timing and the need to eliminate all vestiges of the dual school system.

It has given our office additional capacity to achieve compliance, and we have carefully laid our plans in order to reflect the Court's decision in our dealings wtih school districts under HEW jurisdiction.

It suffices to say for the moment that our action will not only reflect the Court's action, but will also reflect Secretary Finch's October 30 statement that we should not "tolerate any further delays in abolishing the vestiges of the dual school system."

At this point, let me sound one note of caution: The greatest time for vigilance is now—a court order is fine but the product is finer. A Court ruling by itself will not accomplish the task. There is a tragic lesson to be learned from 15 years of delay. In 1957, a new dawn appeared but so did a thousand new black schools. In 1964, another new dawn appeared in the Civil Rights Act but so did free choice and a hundred other methods of delay. Today, we talk of "finality" and there are those who still talk of fighting this decision to the death. The combined voices of civil rights groups, the constant campaign in the halls of Congress and in State houses and city halls must continue and must be effective, if this job is to be done once and for all. Because the court has spoken, is no reason to let down the guard and consider the struggle done. Your role is as great as ever and the Nation's need for your voice and your vigilance is as great as it ever was.

Where does this leave us today, assuming that significant new strides can be made in this school year toward unitary school systems? Schools, of course, are only part of the battle for equal rights. My jurisdiction alone extends to colleges, hospitals, and even fair employment practices on Federal education and health contracts. But schools provide us with perhaps the best example of civil rights progress and the lack of it.

History, I believe, will record our ability to deal with the problem of race relations largely by how we deal with the problem of providing equal educational opportunities. For it is what we do today in schools that will determine whether millions of minority group children are divided forever from the opportunities of our society or whether they are permitted to share that society with those they must learn to live with.

It is a deep belief of mine that we stand to lose the hard-fought years of social progress we have seen in recent years, and to polarize society almost beyond reconciliation, if we do not recognize and act on the segregation-desegregation crisis we face today in public education.

The rhetoric has changed, the alternatives are more stark, but the civil rights community is still equipped to cope.

The "in" phrases of today, "community control," "decentralization," "educational parks," and "relevant education" are born of the same universe as those emotion-packed phrases, "busing," "neighborhood schools," "separatism," and "student boycott." The sooner we recognize and act on the relationship between those two sets of slogans, the sooner we will save the best of education and move on to better days.

There is a trade-off, although it is not always as simply seen as I state it, between the call for "separatism" and the need for "equal" education. I think it is not too late to exercise that trade-off, although it can become too late if we do not do something about it this year.

We have seen the challenge all too clearly this year at both the public college and the public elementary and secondary school level, as we try to undo racially dual systems of education.

Negroes are looking for assurances that the burden of integration will be shared by white and black alike. The unspoken—and sometimes articulated—exchange for such assurances is a lessened need for separatism.

The black community is saying, in many instances, "So far, integration is seriously flawed in both attitude and execution, and we are being forced to make the best of what you have left us; make integration work for us, and we are with you." It is an understandable outlook, one which the majority community of this nation, white, richer and better educated, must accept as its challenge.

If our experience at the Office for Civil Rights does not convey some deep sense of urgency, the message of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders—the Kerner Commission—should do so.

In February of 1968, the basic conclusion of this distinguished panel was that "Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal." This past February, John Gardner, President of the Urban Coalition, which participated in a "year-after" appraisal of what the Kerner report had studied, said, "We are a year closer to being two societies, black and white, increasingly separate and scarcely less unequal."

The Kerner Commission, after estimating that the number of Negroes in the 15 to 24-year old age group will rise 40% by 1975, compared with only a 23% growth rate among whites in this age group, makes this observation:

"This rapid increase in the young Negro population has important implications for the country. This group has the highest unemployment rate in the nation, commits a relatively high proportion of all crimes, and plays the most significant role in civil disorders. By the same token, it is a great reservoir of underused human resources which are vital to the nation."

What is not mentioned is that the 20-year-old of today was the five year old of 1954 and that the 20-year-old of 1975 is today's 14-year-old, and that his younger brothers and sisters are as likely as not to follow in the very same footsteps, for better or worse. School is his all, today.

Does anyone really think that we can keep this youth isolated by race in school and then expect him to take his place in a society which promises equal treatment of all men? A child, sensitized only to one color and one set of attitudes does not emerge to cope successfully with a world his parents never made. This cycle must end.

And it is not only because desegregation will help make our society one but because desegregation is quality education for a minority that has been discriminated against in what is virtually a "second school system." All of the evidence gathered before or since 1954 indicates that it is true that the segregated individual receives an inferior education to the integrated individual.

The Coleman report was commissioned under the 1964 Civil Rights Act to study the equality of equal educational opportunity—or more precisely, the lack of such opportunity—in every section of the country.

Probably the best single test of the value of integration lies in comparing Negro children in totally segregated school situations with those in majority white school situations.

The Coleman report showed that test scores rose among Negro students in classes with 50% or more white students, compared with those Negroes in totally segregated classes. What seemed more important was that, as Coleman said, "Those students who first entered desegregated schools in the early grades generally show slightly higher average scores than the students who first came to desegregated schools in later grades."

If there is one thing the Coleman Report—the second largest social science survey in history—seems to prove, it is that where Federal effort in equalizing education is concerned, the slight changes which have marked most compensatory programs seem to have relatively little effect on disadvantaged pupils. Far more important, implies the report, is the family and socioeconomic background of the child and that of his classmates.

Not only was a disadvantaged child of any race likely to achieve much more in a school full of middle-class pupils than he would in a school full of other disadvantaged youngsters, but—and here is where we take a big swipe at one of the big myths abounding today—the middle-class youngster was not likely to suffer from the integrated situation.

It is not hard to take the one necessary next step and say that because most disadvantaged youngsters are from racial minority groups, and most middle-class youngsters are from the white majority population, we may argue that racial integration in schools would do more to lift the educational level of the disadvantaged thousands of children in America today, than any quantity of financial aid directed at schools which maintain the racial status quo.

Recognizing the importance of this process, what are the barriers to progress in desegregation? Certainly, one of the biggest blockades is frustration. Yesterday, the frustration of the white community brought us up short; today, whites are joined by a growing number of Negro citizens whose justified frustration hinders the advancement of desegregation.

To many who have been involved in the civil rights movement, inside or outside the government, the stereotype of resistance to desegregation is the white parent who fears what he calls "mixing," of Negro and white children. That element remains, of course, but there are other barriers as well as the old community attitudes of the white parent. One of these barriers is the frustrated feeling of the white citizen that he is not being supported even when he agrees to cooperate. Too often, a school superintendent, convinced he should go along with the law, agrees to an integration plan, only to see a neighbor school district get away with little or no integration under a Federal court order. Too often, white board members and parents of good will see their effort undermined by a small group out to set up a private school, and thereby evade the requirements of the law. Too often, there appears no support, or worse, local political opposition, to the school board member within his own community, so that the man of courage is actually hurt by his law-abiding actions.

In the North, the disaffection and feeling of frustration of the white man where race relations are concerned, are becoming the subject of entire books. He is the 'forgotten American." He moves his family two doors away from a school, only to find his children bused to a school in another neighborhood. Every frustration, whether it is that of a fatter pay envelope because of inflation, that of his everyday traffic jam, or that of a rise in the crime rate which he cannot control, is translated into racial terms, and has its focus in such an emotional subject as desegregation and any proposal to transport children to achieve that end. He is unhappy, and he is going to let us know it. He is standing in our way today as his Southern counterpart did when the call comes to desegregate.

And the black community is more impatient with this resistance than ever before. The new awareness of self, the new feeling of impatience, has combined to give us at times a less than cooperative Negro community, a community which does not automatically open the door when we say "We want to help you." They have not seen enough benefit from the help in education that was promised 15 years ago in the Supreme Court decision which said that separate but equal schools weren't equal after all.

The frustration of the slowness of desegregation, the lack of strong and consistent support to those who have led the way, the frustration of seeing racial separation increase in the cities instead of diminish, the more subtle but no less cruel forms of racial discrimination in the North, and the failure to meet promise with production throughout the Nation, have led many black and white to follow the path to new forms of separatism—to greater polarization that threatens to tear our society apart.

How do we meet the challenges that each of these resistant groups pose to the law as set forth in Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Supreme Court, and the policy that I believe in?

My obligation in the first instance seems pretty clear, and that is to offer the utmost support to the white school superintendents who are courageous enough to stand up to the fire and obey civil rights law. And the clearest way is to remain consistent within our own program and to enlist the aid of other Federal agencies, from the Justice Department which goes into the courts, to the Model Cities program of HUD, to the Extension Service at Agriculture and others to support the requirements of the 1964 Civil Rights Act when they deal with any and all school districts.

Where the northern white community is concerned, I think there is a lot more education needed, as to what the law requires and how we are going to enforce it. Some of the old myths of what constitutes de facto segregation and what constitutes illegal discriminatory segregation, need drastic revision and more realistic and enlightened attitudes and policies brought to bear.

Where the opposition by the frustrated in the black community is concerned, I think a lot can be done by indeed showing good faith in action, rather than words. I think we have to show that we are willing to wade in where political heat prevails against us, that we are able to achieve results in terms of number of children helped through desegregation.

Bu⁺ that is not all that we must do by the Negro community and its frustration. We will have to understand and react to the cry for more dignity, more attention to the burden which he has borne, not only before 1964, but since then, in the desegregation effort. We should seek a way to desegregate, not close, black schools, to protect not fire black teachers when a system desegregates, to provide curricula which meet the needs of the black community as well as the white and to otherwise realize that the society is pluralistic, not all white, and not all closed up.

The young of all minorities—Indian children, Mexican American children and Negro children—who have been, in effect, put aside by school establishments through the years, must have their even break in a racially heterogeneous classroom.

Much progress has been made—but despite the blood that has been spilled, the battle for equal rights is still young. Although the Office for Civil Rights directed the implementation of over 340 desegregation plans in September, over 156 districts remain untouched by administrative action. Although we have urged districts not to close good facilities, they continue to do so. Although we are now successfully using our Executive Order tool to protect black teachers, complaints continue to come in. Although we have notified five college systems that they must desegregate, few have presented effective plans.

And what of our northern effort? It has become clear to me that the old bugaboo of keeping Federal hands off northern school systems because they are only "de facto" segregated, instead of "de jure" segregated as the result of some official act, is a fraud. There are few if any pure "de facto" situations. Lift the rock of de facto, and all too frequently something ugly and discriminatory crawls out from under it. Sometimes it was years ago that discrimination occurred, but the minority children have suffered since, and that should be undone. Sure, racial housing patterns may coincide with school attendance patterns by race, but which came first and how was the school boundary drawn? What role, if any, did pre-1949 racial covenants in FHA-loan housing play in these housing patterns? There are many avenues which have not been fully explored that I promise you will be, before any northern school system we examine can be called truly "de facto." And despite those who believe the legal requirements are the same, it still takes a lot longer to make an effective case for fund cut-off or successful negotiation for a desegregation plan in the North, but we are going to take the time where necessary. We have been in over 50 districts in the North, and over 12 are now being considered for administrative action. As a result of a 1968–69 National Survey, over 500 northern districts have been targeted as possible problem areas for future investigation. We are beginning a full field review of San Francisco, the first city over 500,000 in population where we expect to stay on the job until we determine that the city school system either is or is not in compliance with Title VI.

Before I try to explore areas of common action with you, let me briefly mention one more aspect of civil rights enforcement in the Federal government which distresses me considerably. I refer, of course, to the seeming unawareness of any civil rights responsibility by any program agency which does not have the words "civil rights" or "equal opportunity" in its title. We have agencies like the Office for Civil Rights and the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, but they cannot carry the entire burden of human rights within government. Some have suggested that the Federal government would be more effective in its approach to civil rights if it created a separate Department of Human Rights, or something along that line. Such a move may indeed be necessary if program agencies do not get off the hook and recognize the importance of not subsidizing discrimination via the Federal pork barrel.

By any standard applied, it is up to individual program officers within agencies to take upon themselves the responsibility to see what the consequences of their particular program or grant will be, where school integration or any other human rights is concerned.

It is at this point that you—members of the private and quasi-public organization dedicated to equal rights—can play an extremely useful role. For you not only have concern, but the power to transform that concern into political influence. You have become the conscience of our government in the area of equal rights and your responsibilities are greater today than ever before. You must search out agencies which are acting in ways to promote segregation or separatism by race, whether by design or by default, and exert your influence to bring about change. You must seek out the hidden issues—like academic testing for class assignment or college entrance and tax exemption for segregated private schools—and make them the causes that some have already begun to make them for the wrong reasons and for the wrong ends.

Perhaps most difficult, but most needed by all communities in the Nation today and in the coming immediate months and years, you and this government must have the courage to insist upon official and unofficial action at the local level which unifies the community across racial lines instead of dividing it. It is increasingly easier and more popular to condone or promote separatism by and for minorities instead of finding and promoting an equally beneficial integrated alternative. We have made enough progress in civil rights to build on that progress instead of turning our back on it.

There are today from 1 to 4 million Negroes in the United States who hold attitudes indicating "a depth of estrangement and bitterness unique in American history," says Gary T. Marx, a noted student of Negro opinion who just updated an analysis he made two years ago. He reports that in these past two years, the number of bitter black citizens "is growing and increases noticeably among the young and those in the North."

But the real kicker, it seems to me, is that, contrary to much of the talk today about the desire for black separatism, Mr. Marx reports that "Much of the anger which exists remains directed toward inclusion in the system," and that 1967 findings that most Negroes favor integration "would seem still to hold in 1969, if perhaps not as strongly."

The question, then leaps out at us: How much longer can we expect this building anger to have integration as a trade-off element? How much longer before it is not just the small but vocal militant group, but another million and then still another million of the increasingly angry who say the Hell with it, the Hell with your integration and the Hell with your lousy society? As Mr. Marx says:

"Many of the interracial differences with respect to ideas about the treatment of blacks; the amount of progress; the worth of demonstration; integrated schools and housing; the cause, meaning and consequences of riots; and the type of ameliorative action required, are astounding and can lead to deeply pessimistic conclusions.

"They indicate a profound lack of communication and the absence of understanding or compassion among a very large portion of the white public."

It is my strong belief that the Federal government has a clear legal obligation under the Constitution, a moral obligation as a servant of all citizens, white and black alike, to do more than merely mirror the white thinking on the subject of race relations and equal opportunity. It is certainly not our duty to adopt wholesale the black thinking on the racial subject, either, especially when that thinking may be contrary to the Constitution. But it is our duty, affirmatively and aggressively, to make certain that no group of citizens is systematically ostracized from society merely because the majority wishes it so.

This is the foundation of my urgency and the outline of my philosophy. This is why I try to convince any audience I talk to, that desegregation is right, desegregation under law is necessary, and desegregation is a current imperative job—for every single agency of the United States Government, for the education community overall, and for groups such as those you represent. This is the tomorrow we must work hand in hand to achieve or there will be no tomorrow at all.

FEDERAL INTERFERENCE IN EDUCATION

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the junior chamber of commerce in Alabama enjoys a well-earned reputation for getting things done. The members of this organization are primarily junior executives and include among its members some of the most intelligent, energetic, and conscientious young men in our State. The people of Alabama admire and respect the junior chamber of commerce and listen attentively to its points of view on all public issues.

Mr. President, the Forum is the official publication of the Mobile, Ala., Jaycees. The November 1969 issue, contains an article entitled "A Jaycee Speaks Out on Federal Interference In Public Education," written by Charles Steiner III. The article suggests that there are many steps that can be taken to restore local control of local public schools. Support of my proposed amendment to the Constitution to effect a return of local control is mentioned as one such step.

Mr. President, I commend this thoughtful article to the consideration of Senators and the public as an indication of a deeply held conviction on the part of responsible leadership in the State of Alabama. The issues presented are, of course, nationwide in scope, and I think that the public generally would profit by the persuasive arguments presented for local control of educational institutions. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A JAYCEE SPEAKS OUT ON FEDERAL INTERFERENCE IN PUBLIC EDUCATION

(By Charles Steiner)

The people of Alabama, the South and throughout the Nation have always preferred to raise the level of their children's education through their own local and state school boards without dependency upon the U.S. Department of Education or the Federal Government itself. When it comes to public education, we of America feel that complete authority over the enrollment and assignment of children in public schools and/or on school buses should lie in the hands of the duly elected county and city school boards which are the truly elected representatives of the states, counties, and cities. We must not permit the U.S. Supreme Court, the HEW or any other federal power to usurp the authority of our elected school officials and make pawns of the American school children. The school board is conscientiously and sincerely trying to solve their problems. To force them to do the impossible would do and is doing nothing but creating chaos and wrecking our total public education system.

The federal government must recognize and respect the vote of the people and give those elected officials the chance to provide the best leadership and public administration possible in public education as well as in law enforcement, welfare programs and hospital administration without federal interference. The real intentions of the federal government, but not that of the American people, is to eliminate all vestiges of a dual school system by closing schools, massive busing of children from their neighborhoods, equalizing student achievements, integrating the races across any boundaries, and making the schools an important agency for solving social problems of the slums. The intention of the people of this country is for "Freedom of Choice" in our schools and for the public to vote on those issues that affect our public education system rather than trust the Supreme Court, HEW, or other federal offices to determine what is best for the people.

We have a responsibility as citizens of America to see that our rights are not violated but are honored according to those laws set down by the Bill of Rights, the U.S. Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. We should not sit idly by, but defend our constitutional system of government and its cherished freedoms to reverse the flow of this destruction of our states rights and of our public education system. Through our heritage, we believe that the right to self-government is based on the inherent right and highest duty of a free people to preserve and protect their God-given freedoms that are enjoyed in America. As Americans, we also believe that the best education for us and our children is one free of political control or government domination. There is no need for central or regional control of our public education system. Its deficiencies can best be understood locally where the people and the elected officials of a community have the best opportunity to judge the problems and progress of its students.

Only through a free public education system can we produce citizens worthy of America who will use their knowledge to better the democratic principles of this nation and who will better their own lives so that future generations may enjoy the freedoms of this country. We, both the federal government and citizens, must have confidence that the people can be trusted to govern themselves, that they are able to provide adequate education for all students and that they can provide the leadership necessary to guide this nation forward. If it takes a constitutional amendment to assure our rights to govern ourselves and administer our schools locally, then we should act now to see that such a step is taken. Thus we will make certain that the people, themselves, and not the federal government or the courts have the final voice in the administration of our cities and of our public school systems. Until we continue to safeguard our cherished rights, we will lose our rights to live as free Americans.

We must not lose patience with our court systems or with the procedure of laws but we must use this system to right the wrongs that unjust laws and decrees have done to destroy our school system and weaken our governments. There are many steps that can be taken. One of them is to seek the support nationwide for the passage of an amendment to the Constitution by U.S. Senator James Allen that relates to powers reserved to the several States. It states that each state shall have the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the organization and administration of all public schools and public school systems within the State and that no officer or court of the United States shall have the power to impair or infringe any right so reserved to the States. The free voice of the people should be heard, and the best way is through their votes and the courts to protect their rights as Americans.

What better way can the Jaycees serve their fellow man than through the protection of the rights of all and also to see that our public education system remains the responsibility of the local school boards. This is a choice that has to be made by us if our country is ever to remain free, democratic and independent and if the rights of our citizens are to remain sacred.

DRAFT REFORM

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in the past week there have been rapid and diverse developments in the general field of draft reform. The National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence published a report which included in it a call for broad reforms; the President signed his draft reform bill and issued an Executive order establishing a lottery; and the Selective Service System last night actually conducted the lottery itself.

Because many Members of Congress were not in Washington over the Thanksgiving holiday and may have missed various of the significant elements of these developments, I have assembled the relevant pieces of information for printing in the RECORD. They are:

Exhibit 1. Excerpt from report of the Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence.

Exhibit 2. Statement by President Nixon on signing the bill.

Exhibit 3. Executive Order 11497.

Exhibit 4. White House fact sheet.

Exhibit 5. Department of Defense fact sheet.

Exhibit 6. Newspaper articles.

I ask unanimous consent that these exhibits be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the exhibits were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT FROM REPORT OF COMMISSION ON THE CAUSES AND PREVENTION OF VIOLENCE

A significant focal point of dissent by the young has been the issue of draft reform. To many, the draft symbolizes the inflexibility of our institutions and all that is wrong with the government's treatment of the young. Further, the inequities of the system have been set in sharp relief by the reality of the on-going war that many youth believe to be immoral and futile. The "oldest-first" order of draft calls produces a period of prolonged uncertainty for young men that profoundly affects their education, career and marriage decisions—a condition which is made more unacceptable by the lack of uniform deferment and exemption standards and by the wide variation in the exercise of discretion by local boards. Draft reform will not take the sting out of student anti-war protest or other manifestations of student discontent, but it could go far to reduce the tensions and frustrations that now lead some young men to seek refuge abroad and others to destroy Selective Service records, burn draft cards, or disrupt induction centers.

A random lottery system which would subject all to equal treatment at age nineteen, would take the youngest rather than the oldest first, and would reduce the period of prime draft vulnerability from the present seven years to one year, appears to be the fairest and most promising alternative to the existing draft system. Undergraduate deferments would be continued, but with the understanding that the year of maximum vulnerability would come whenever the deferment expired. It would be far less disruptive in the lives of young men while fully consistent with national security needs. The President has recommended such a proposal to the Congress. We are pleased to note that the Congress has approved the random lottery feature.

We also strongly endorse the balance of President Nixon's proposals for reform of the draft system, which are similar to that recommended in 1967 by the Marshall Commission and the Clark Panel.[1] To the extent these proposals require further legislation, we urge the Congress to enact it.

Assuming the enactment of random selection system, however, the area of discretion for local draft boards is enormous and is likely to remain so.

We therefore urge that renewed attention be given to the recommendations of the Marshall Commission for building a greater measure of due process into the exercise of draft board discretion.

Youth should also be given a role on local draft boards.

We therefore recommend that in exercising his power to appoint the members of local draft boards, the President name at least one person under 30 years of age to each local board.[2]

At present, the Selective Service System calls only about a third of the eligible young men for the draft each year. Reform of the system will not alter this, but by taking the youngest first and by reducing the period of uncertainty from seven years to one, it will free many young men to make firm decisions about their futures. The federal government should do much more to provide these young men, as well as other young men and women in all walks of life, with the opportunities for service to their communities and the nation. As the Peace Corps and VISTA experiences bear out, many young people are eager to assist the less fortunate to achieve social justice and willing to devote a part of their lives to tasks for which the major reward is the satisfaction of helping others.

We do not suggest that voluntary service of this kind should be an alternative to military service. Rather, we suggest that public service opportunities be made available, regardless of military service, to young men and young women, high school and college graduates, inner city, suburban, and rural youth—as justified by the nation's needs.

We are convinced that youth will grasp meaningful opportunities for attacking constructively the problems and injustices that, too often, now drive them to attacks aimed at the destruction of useful institutions, rather than at their reform. But we recognize their skepticism of government-sponsored programs and their increasing unwillingness to become involved in social action programs in which they have no voice. Consequently, we believe that a new and flexible approach to youth service opportunities is required, one that is tailored to individual talents and desires.

We urge the President to seek legislation to expand the opportunities for youth to engage in both full-time and part-time public service, by providing federal financial support to young people who wish to engage in voluntary, non-military service to their communities and to the nation.

We do not suggest the creation of another federally-administered program, or set of programs, comparable to the Peace Corps or VISTA. Instead we suggest that a large number of full- and part-time public service options be opened to youth—opportunities which the youths themselves can be expected to seek out and to improve upon, and which can be filled and administered at the local level if federal financial support is made available. We have in mind such possibilities as teaching and reading assistants, tutors and counselors in the elementary and secondary schools; hospital orderlies and nurses' aides; personnel for neighborhood service and recreation centers; auxiliary aides to local law enforcement and social service agencies; and many others.

The service opportunities would be approved by a central federal agency. The authorizing statute should set general standards of agency approval, eligibility, and levels of compensation. The choice of the particular public service opportunity from the large approved list of public and private institutions and groups should be left to the volunteers, and the initiative, direction and control of the activities would remain entirely with the approved local entity.[3]

The program might be launched to recruit 100,000 young people each year for four or five years, as experience was accumulated. The eventual goal might be as high as 1,000,000 active youth volunteers in service at any given time, depending upon experience and developing national needs. As is now true for Peace Corps and similar existing programs, the compensation to be paid should be set at a student subsistence level and should not be financially competitive with other employment opportunities. As a special inducement, however, we recommend that completion of two years of full-time public service entitle the participant to educational assistance comparable to that available to veterans under the GI Bill of Rights, with lesser amounts of assistance for service periods between six months and two years.[4]

Voluntary public service could contribute to reduction of the large backlog of unmet social needs, and thus could be an important step toward a more humane reordering of national priorities. And youth service could

Doc. 374, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 1968. Our recommendations, of course, refer only to the present draft system and are intended to apply only so long as it continues. The question of whether the draft should be replaced for the long term by a form of volunteer service in the armed forces is now under consideration by another Presidential commission.

[2] As suggested by Joseph A. Califano, Jr., in his book The Student Revolution, W. W. Norton & Co., Inc., New York 1970. The Marshall Commission found that the average aged local board members was 58. One fifth of all the nearly 17,000 board members were over 70. While twelve were over 90, only one was under 30.

[3] One considerable virtue of the approach to youth service suggested here is that it involves a "market strategy" rather than a "monopoly service" strategy: the multitude of public and private agencies would have to compete for the services of the federally-supported youth workers by offering them meaningful, satisfying opportunities for achievement of desired goals; less successful, unrewarding programs would fail to attract volunteers and hence would not waste the public funds being committed to youth service. Cf. the discussion of the importance of market-type incentives for success in public programs in Moynihan, "Toward a National Urban Policy," The Public Interest (No. 17, Fall 1969).

[4] Depending on the availability of funds, educational assistance could be limited on the basis of demonstrated need.

signify to the young that our nation is committed to the achievement of social justice, as well as to military security.

[From the office of the White House Press Secretary, Nov. 26, 1969]

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT AT SIGNING OF H.R. 14001, AN ACT TO AMEND THE MILITARY SELECTIVE SERVICES ACT OF 1967

Mr. Secretary, Members of the Senate and House, and Members of the Youth Advisory Committee who are present here today:

I am here for the purpose of signing the draft reform bill, which has been passed by the House and the Senate.

In signing this bill, I think it might be well to refer to a statement that was made over 100 years ago by General Grant with regard to the draft that was then in effect.

He said that the agony of suspense is worse than the effect of the law itself.

As far as this draft reform bill is concerned, it does not remove all of the inequity of the draft, because there will be inequity as long as any of our young men have to serve when others do not have to serve. But the agony of suspense and uncertainty which has hung over our younger generation for seven years can now be reduced to one year, and other very needed reforms in the draft can be made by Executive Order.

In signing the bill, I want to impress upon everybody here that while the Administration took the initiative through the Secretary of Defense's recommendation in sending this bill to the Congress, it could not be here for signature by the President had it not had strong bipartisan support by Members of the Democratic Party in the House and Senate, as well as Members of the Republican Party. This is truly a bipartisan measure and the credit should be taken by both parties as the bill signing occurs.

Finally, I would say that looking to the future, while this measure will remove a great number of inequities and particularly remove the uncertainty to which I refer, we shall not be satisfied until we finally can have the system which I advocated during the campaign of a completely volunteer armed forces. We cannot move to that now because of the requirements for armed services. That is, however, our ultimate goal.

Now I will sign the measure.

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 11497—AMENDING THE SELECTIVE SERVICE REGULATIONS TO PRESCRIBE RANDOM SELECTION

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Military Selective Service Act of 1967 (62 Stat. 604, as amended), I hereby prescribe the following amendments of the Selective Service Regulations prescribed by Executive Orders No. 10001 of September 17, 1948, No. 10202 of January 12, 1951, No. 10292 of September 25, 1951, No. 10659 of February 15, 1956, No. 10735 of October 17, 1957, No. 10984 of January 5, 1962, No. 11098 of March 14, 1963, No. 11119 of September 10, 1963, No. 11241 of August 26, 1965, No. 11360 of June 30, 1967, and constituting portions of Chapter XVI of Title 32 of the Code of Federal Regulations:

1. Section 1631.4, Calls by the Secretary of Defense, is amended by revoking paragraphs (b) and (c) and redesignating paragraph (d) as (b).

2. Section 1631.5, Calls by the Director of Selective Service, is amended by adding a new paragraph (d), to read as follows:

"(d) The Director of Selective Service shall establish a random selection sequence for induction. Such random selection sequence shall be determined as the President may direct, and shall be applied nationwide. The first sequence shall determine the order of selection of registrants (other than delinquents or volunteers) who prior to January 1, 1970, shall have attained their nineteenth year of age but not their twenty-sixth. New random selection sequences shall be established, in a similar manner, for registrants who attain their nineteenth year of age on or after January 1, 1970. The random sequence number determined for any registrant shall apply to him so long as he remains subject to random selection. A random sequence number established for a registrant shall be equivalent, for purposes of selection, to the same random sequence number established for other registrants in other drawings."

3. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of Section 1631.7, Action by Local Board Upon Receipt of Notice of Call, are revoked, paragraph (c) is redesignated as paragraph (b), and a new paragraph (a) is prescribed to read as follows:

"(a) When a call is received by a Notice of Call on Local Board (SSS Form 201) from the State Director of Selective Service for a specified number of men to be delivered for induction, or for a specified number of men in a medical, dental, or allied specialist category to be delivered for induction, the Executive Secretary or clerk, if so authorized, or a local board member shall select and issue orders to report for induction to the number of men required to fill the call from among its registrants who have been classified in Class I-A or Class I-A-O and have been found acceptable for service in the Armed Forces and to whom a Statement of Acceptability (DD Form 62) has been mailed at least 21 days before the date fixed for induction: Provided, That any registrant classified in Class I-A or Class I-A-O who is subject to random selection as herein provided, whose random sequence number has been reached, and who would have been ordered to report for induction except for delays due to a pending personal appearance, appeal, preinduction examination, reclassification, or otherwise, shall if and when found acceptable and when such delay is concluded, be ordered to report for induction next after delinquents and volunteers even if the year in which he otherwise would have been ordered to report has ended and even if (in cases of extended liability) he has attained his twenty-sixth birthday: Provided further, That a registrant classified in Class I-A or Class I-A-O who has volunteered for induction or who is a delinquent may be selected and ordered to report for induction to fill an induction call notwithstanding the fact that he has not been found acceptable for service in the Armed Forces and regardless of whether or not a Statement of Acceptability (DD Form 62) has been mailed to him. Registrants shall be selected and ordered to report for induction in the following categories and in the order indicated:

"(1) Delinquents who have attained the age of 19 years in the order of their dates of birth with the oldest being selected first.

"(2) Volunteers who have not attained the age of 26 years in the sequence in which they have volunteered for induction.

"(3)(i) 1970. In the calendar year 1970, non-volunteers born on or after January 1, 1944, and on or before December 31, 1950, who have not attained the 26th anniversary of the dates of their birth, in the order of their random sequence numbers established by random selection procedures prescribed in accordance with paragraph (d) of section 1631.5. The non-volunteers thus subject to selection are designated the 1970 Selection Group and constitute category (3) for 1970. Members of the 1970 Selection Group on December 31, 1970, whose random sequence numbers have not been reached by that date, shall be assigned to the priority group which is immediately below the First Priority Selection Group for 1971.

"(ii) 1971 and Later Years. For calendar year 1971, and for each subsequent year, a new First Priority Selection Group and lower priority groups shall be established which together will constitute category (3) for that year. The First Priority Selection Group shall consist (A) of nonvolunteers in Class I-A and Class I-A-O who prior to January 1 of each such calendar year have attained the age of 19 years but not of 20 years, and (B) of nonvolunteers who prior to January 1 of each such calendar year have attained the age of 19 but not of 26 years and who during that year are classified into Class I-A or class I-A-O following expiration of their deferments or exemptions or otherwise. Members of each such First Priority Selection Group, who have not attained the 26th anniversary of the dates of their birth, shall be selected in the order of their random sequence numbers. Members of each such First Priority Selection Group on December 31 of the respective calendar year whose random sequence numbers are not reached by that date shall be assigned to successively lower priority groups, so that those who were in the 1970 Selection Group and who move into a lower priority group at the end of 1970 as herein provided will be in the lowest such group, those who were in the 1971 First Priority Selection Group will be in the next to the lowest such group, and so forth. Any registrant who was subject to selection in the 1970 Selection Group or in the First Priority Selection Group for any subsequent year, who thereafter is assigned to a lower priority group in category (3), who while in such a lower priority group receives a deferment or exemption, and who subsequently is reclassified into Class I-A or Class I-A-O, shall be reassigned to the priority group in which he would have been if he had not received such deferment or exemption.

"(iii) Certain Registrants Married Before August 27, 1965. Within each group in category (3) there shall be a subgroup consisting of registrants who have a wife whom they married on or before August 26, 1965, and with whom they maintain a bona fide family relationship in their homes. Registrants in any such subgroup shall be in all respects subject to this paragraph, except that they shall be selected after other registrants in the group of which that subgroup is a part.

"(4) Nonvolunteers who attain the age of 19 years during the calendar year but who have not attained the age of 20 years, in the order of their dates of birth with the oldest being selected first.

"(5) Nonvolunteers who have attained the age of 26 years in the order of their dates of birth with the youngest being selected first.

"(6) Nonvolunteers who have attained the age of 18 years and 6 months and who have not attained the age of 19 years in the order of their dates of birth with the oldest being selected first."

NEW DRAFT SELECTION SYSTEM FACT SHEET

This fact sheet describes the major revisions in the draft selection procedures placed into effect by President Nixon under the authority of Public Law 91-124, November 26, 1969. It describes how this new system will work and presents information on the draft outlook for young men in 1970 under this system.

MAJOR CHANGES

The new program accomplishes the following major improvements in draft selection procedures:

1. It reduces the period of prime draft vulnerability, and the uncertainty that accompanies it, from up to 7 years, under the previous system, to only 1 year.

2. It establishes this vulnerability for a fixed time in each young man's life, which will be much less disruptive to him in terms of his personal planning.

3. It establishes a fair and easily understandable method of random selection among such young men, if they are found by their local boards to be available and qualified for service.

4. It undertakes to establish as soon as possible procedures under which a Selective Service registrant may request an Armed Forces examination so that he can know if he is physically and mentally qualified for military service.

These changes are presented in greater detail below.

1. Limited vulnerability

Under the previous draft procedure a young man began his time of maximum vulnerability to the draft at age 19 and, if he did not volunteer for service, remained in that status until he was drafted or reached his 26th birthday. Selection among men in this age group who were found "available and qualified" for service by their draft boards was on an oldest-first basis. Under recent conditions of relatively high draft calls the age of involuntary induction has been low, averaging about 20½ years. However, when draft calls were much smaller, as they had been during the early 1960's, the average draft age had reached nearly 24 years. This had created a long period of uncertainty for young men and had handicapped many of them in attempting to get jobs or training, and made it difficult for them to plan their lives intelligently.

Under the revised system a "First Priority Selection Group" is established which will normally constitute the only group from which men will be called involuntarily into service, other than those delinquent in their obligations under the law, or medical, dental, and allied specialists (who are subject to special calls after they complete their professional training.) Those registrants who are not selected for induction during their 12-month period of exposure will then be placed into a lower priority category and will normally not be vulnerable for induction except under the unlikely circumstances that the First Priority Group is completely exhausted. Thus, under normal conditions a young man will receive an earlier and more decisive answer to his question, "Where do I stand with the draft?" and will be able to plan his life accordingly.

2. The new order of call

Under the new system, as under the previous procedure, the first priorities for induction in any draft board will consist of registrants who are delinquent in their responsibilities under the law and of those volunteering for induction. The principal, or "First Priority Selection Group" for involuntary induction will, however, be limited after 1970 (the initial transitional year) to draft eligible men in their 19th year of age at the beginning of the year and to those men between the ages of 19 and 26 whose deferments expired during the year upon completion of school or for other reasons. The new procedure thus establishes a "youngest first" rather than "oldest first" priority for induction. This will result in a stable and predictable draft age period for each young man—either in the year following his attainment of age 19 or in the year after he leaves school or otherwise ceases to be deferred.

However, in 1970, beginning with the draft call to be filled in January 1970, this First Priority Group will also include all draft eligible men who are in the ages 20 through 25 at the beginning of the year, so that no individual eligible for induction under the previous rules will escape vulnerability simply because of the change to the new system.

3. Random selection

Since more men are classified as available for service each year than are required to fill current or expected draft calls, a fair and understandable procedure is needed to determine whom to call first, whom to call second, and whom not to call at all. Under the authority of the recent amendment to the draft law (P.L. 91–124, November 26, 1969) President Nixon has authorized the Director of Selective Service to place into effect a simple random selection procedure for this purpose, based upon a random sequence of the 365 or 366 days of each year. An initial drawing to be held on December 1, 1969 will establish this random listing of birth dates for individuals who will be in ages 19 through 25 years on December 31, 1969. This sequence will apply nationally to the order of induction to be followed by each local draft board this coming year. Thus, if June 21 is the first day drawn then those in the first priority group, available for induction, whose birthdays are June 21, will be the first to be ordered for induction involuntarily in January 1970 following delinquents and volunteers. If January 12 is the next date drawn, individuals with that birthday would be second in order of call in their respective draft boards.

In the event that two or more men have the same birth date within a local board their sequence of induction will be determined by the first letter of their names (last name and, if necessary, first name) which will be arranged in a random sequence to be established by a supplemental drawing also to be conducted on December 1. Draft eligibles in the "first priority" age group whose numbers have not been reached at the end of the year, will be placed in a lower order of call next year and will be vulnerable for induction only if the First Priority Group of next year is exhausted.

4. Voluntary armed forces examination

The President has directed the Secretary of Defense and the Director of the Selective Service to establish procedures under which registrants of the Selective Service System may request of their Local Board an armed forces qualifying examinations at the earliest feasible time. Local Boards will schedule such examination to be held at an Armed Forces Examining and Entrance Station.

Random selection and this new opportunity of a registrant to have a qualifying examination will reduce uncertainty and make it more possible for young men to plan their lives.

THE DRAFT OUTLOOK FOR 1970

Young men who will be vulnerable for induction next year will want to know: Once the birthdate drawing has taken place, and a random sequence has been set, what are my chances of being drafted next year?

The actual chances of being reached for induction for draft-eligible men with a given position on the birthdate list will depend upon many factors, particularly upon future military strength requirements as we progress in our efforts to Vietnamize the war and upon the rate of voluntary enlistments and re-enlistments. Any possible changes in draft deferment policies or procedures, resulting from the current reviews within the Administration or from Congressional reviews scheduled for next year could also affect this outlook.

The Department of Defense has, however, prepared certain estimates based upon the best available information at this time. These esimates show the projected military manpower requirements from the pool of men, age 19–25 years, who will be available for induction during 1970. This pool is estimated at 850,000, including about 500,000 19–25 year olds who would be immediately available at the beginning of the year, if fully examined and processed, and an additional 350,000 who will become available during 1970 when their deferments expire. The DOD has further estimated that a total of 550,000, or 64% of this group, will be required for military service either as volunteers or inductees. This is based on the currently planned military end strength of about 3.2 million in June 1970 and on an assumption that this strength level will be maintained during the period July–December 1970. Based on past experience it is expected that 290,000 of the total number required from this group will volunteer for either active or reserve service. The remaining requirement of about 250,000 would, therefore, have to be met through induction. This represents approximately 45% of the residual manpower pool in 1970, excluding those who will have volunteered for service.

In view of the many uncertainties involved in these estimates, our best judgment at this time is that registrants whose birth dates will appear in the top one-third of the random birth date sequence will have a high probability of being drafted; those in the middle one-third, an average probability of being drafted, and those in the bottom one-third, a relatively low probability of being reached for induction.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE FACT SHEET ON SELECTIVE SERVICE MANPOWER POOL PROJECTIONS FOR CALENDER YEAR 1970, NOVEMBER 20, 1969

In Secretary Laird's testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee on H.R. 14001, November 14, 1969, statistics based on the attached table (Table 1) were provided to the Committee.

Secretary Laird emphasized in his testimony that the projections of inductions appearing on this table were derived from the following assumptions:

(1) That the military end strength for the current fiscal year ending on June 30, 1970 would be approximately 3.2 million (based on current budget plans) and

(2) that this strength would be maintained during the period July–December 1970.

Secretary Laird further noted that he considered the resulting draft call estimate a maximum estimate of next year's draft calls.

Based on these assumptions, the attached table shows the projected military manpower requirements from the pool of men aged 19–25 years, who will be available for induction during 1970. These estimates indicate that, of the 850,000 Selective Service registrants in this age group who will be available and qualified for service, a total of 540,000 or 64% will be required for military service, either as volunteers or inductees. It is estimated that about 290,000 of this group will volunteer for service, including 190,000 regular enlistees and 100,000 reserve enlistees. Of the remaining group of 560,000 available for induction, 250,000 or 45% would be required for induction.

Also attached is an additional table (Table 2) showing the estimated status of the total age group of young men who will be age 19 as of January 1, 1970.

TABLE 1.—Selective Service manpower pool projections for 1970 under random selection system

1. Estimated selective service manpower pool, ages 19–25, as of Jan. 1, 1970	500,000
2. Net entrants into pool during 1970 (deferments expiring)	350,000
3. Total pool available for service during 1970 (lines 1 and 2)	850,000
4. Less: estimated volunteers from pool during 1970, total	290,000
Active duty enlistments	190,000
Reserve enlistments	100,000

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Selective Service Manpower Pool (line 1). Estimated number of registrants in Class I–A, Available for Service, who would be found qualified for service if fully examined. Excludes I–A registrants whose reclassifications or appeals are pending.

Net Entrants into Pool (line 2). Former students and other registrants reclassified from a deferred status to Class I–A during 1970, less registrants reclassified from I–A to a deferred or exempt status.

Volunteers from Pool. Includes regular enlistments for active service, officer candidate enlistments and enlistments into reserve or National Guard units from Selective Service pool. Excludes voluntary entries into service of individuals below age 19 as of January 1, 1970, as well as accessions into active service of individuals, ages 19–25, who were in a deferred status at time of entry, e.g., ROTC graduates.

DRAFT BILL SIGNED, LOTTERY STARTS JANUARY 1

President Nixon yesterday signed the draft lottery bill he pushed through a reluctant Congress and immediately ordered the institution of a new lottery system, effective Jan. 1.

The President said the new plan would end "the agony of suspense" that has afflicted young men from 19 to 26 and that beginning in 1971 19-year-olds would be drafted first.

In all probability they would be the only ones subject to the draft, except those whose deferments expire.

Declaring that the reform would not end all inequities, Mr. Nixon said he would not be satisfied until "we have a completely volunteer armed force."

Some experts have predicted that drafted men would not be sent to Vietnam after next year.

Next Monday, the Selective Service System will hold a drawing to determine the order of induction. It will place in a bowl the dates for the 365 days of the year. Fifty young men, one from each state, will be invited to do the drawing.

The White House explained that if June 21 is drawn first, those whose birthday is June 21 will be the first ordered for induction in January. If Jan. 12 is the next date drawn, those whose birthday falls on that date will be inducted next.

Since about 850,000 young men will be in the 1970 draft pool and only about 250,000 will be drafted, it is estimated that those whose birthdays are among the first third of the dates drawn will certainly be drafted, those in the second third will have "an average probability of being drafted" and those in the bottom third a low probability.

The President directed Selective Service to permit a registrant to request a physical examination in advance so that he may know whether he is physically and mentally qualified for service.

The "youngest first" plan, where only 19-year-olds will be eligible unless there is a major emergency, will not begin until 1971.

In 1970, all those between 19 and 26 on Dec. 3, 1969, will be eligible for induction under the previous rules will escape vulnerability because of the change to the new system," the White House said.

The drawing Monday at Selective Service will be public. Immediately after the drawing the order of the 1970 calls by birthdays will be known.

There will be a new drawing each year to determine the order in the future.

A drawing also will be held to determine the order in the event of two or more men within a local board have the same birthday.

Letters of the alphabet will be drawn to determine the order. Thus a person whose last name begins with S might be drawn ahead of a man whose last name begins with A, even if they have the same birthdays.

College deferments will continue for undergraduates. But when an individual's exemption expires he will be classified as a 19-year-old and will have the same chance of being drafted as a 19-year-old.

When the President first requested the lottery and 19-year-old-first plan it appeared that he had little chance of winning congressional approval. But after a long fight the essence of his proposal was approved.

When he signed the bill, he praised Democrats and Republicans for their cooperation and said that the bill would not have passed without bipartisan support.

Another fight on draft reform will be waged next year. The President has ordered a study by the National Security Council on draft reform for the future and the study is expected to be completed this year, Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird said yesterday.

The all-volunteer army, which Mr. Nixon promised to work for in last year's campaign, is predicated on an end of the Vietnam war. He said yesterday, "We cannot move to that now because of the requirements of our armed services. That is, however, our ultimate goal."

NEW LOTTERY SYSTEM MAY PROVIDE LEGAL WAY TO ESCAPE DRAFT

(By Stan Benjamin)

President Nixon's draft lottery system may give many deferment holders a perfectly legal way to duck the draft entirely, a White House aide acknowledged yesterday.

Peter Flanigan, Nixon's staff expert on the draft plan, conceded in an interview that a deferred draft registrant could choose the year he wants to be most exposed to the draft by deliberately timing the loss of his deferment—by dropping out of school or quitting a job, for example.

And he could do it, Flanigan said, near the end of a year in which it is already apparent his number is not likely to be called.

The result: a loophole big enough to drive a truckload of college students through.

The student could give himself four years to choose from by starting college and his deferment at age 19—when his draft liability begins. If, during one of those four years, it appears from the lottery his number will be bypassed, he could simply drop out of school or fail his courses, join the 1–A pool, and wait out the year for the draft notice he is pretty certain won't come.

CHANCES DIMINISH

When the year runs out, so does his biggest chance of being drafted. For all practical purposes, he's in the clear unless the draft pool is swept by unexpectedly massive draft calls.

An occupational deferment could be managed the same way.

Theoretically, anyone with a deferment has the same opportunity, but only to the extent he can control the circumstances.

Just such a possibility was pointed out to Flanigan last May after Nixon first outlined his draft proposal, and Flanigan commented then. "Those are damn good questions. We haven't got all the details worked out yet."

Asked yesterday if this loophole in the lottery might be abused by registrants seeking to escape the draft, Flanigan replied, "I guess it could."

The plan signed into law by Mr. Nixon yesterday directs the establishment of an order of draft-call each year by scrambling dates and alphabet letters—the dates signifying birthdays, the alphabet, names.

Once a man gets a number that way for any particular year, it determines his place in line for future years as well.

OTHERS BYPASSED

Depending on the size of the draft pool and the size of the draft calls, some portion of those eligible for draft will actually be called each year, while the others will be bypassed and will become progressively less liable in future years as new registrants step forward.

The hitch arises when a man who is deferred loses his deferment and rejoins the 1-A pool. He brings with him the place-in-line number he drew in the year he turned 19—no matter how many years, or new scrambled lists, have gone by.

No matter how late in the year he loses his deferment said Flanigan, he rejoins that year's pool—in effect, his draft exposure became largely retroactive.

A man with a low number probably could not escape the draft unless calls were cut sharply.

But a deferred man with a number higher than, say, the first one-third of the list, could simply wait until late in the year and then drop out of school or quit his job in time for his draft board to reclassify him 1-A, once he knows his number won't come up.

[From the Washington (D.C.) Daily News, Nov. 28, 1969]

THE LOTTERY IS LAW

It is a shame, of course, that a military draft is necessary in any nation. But the shape of the world (or the misshape of it) compels most countries, and the United States in particular, to maintain a high degree of military force.

This is essential not only for our own safety, but as a deterrent to another global slaughter.

Since this is the case, men of combat age have to be recruited for the armed services. Up to now, the only workable system has been conscription.

But since the armed services didn't need, and couldn't use, all of the men of combat age, many in the nation (and The Washington Daily News and other Scripps-Howard Newspapers especially) long have believed a fairer system of deciding who should go and who should not was seriously needed.

The most practical answer to that problem was a lottery—a device by which those to be called would be chosen at random; so that every young man at least took the same risk of being inducted.

That system now has been adopted, thanks to President Nixon and a change of mind among the military affairs leaders of Congress. Months and years were wasted getting to this decision, but President Nixon was able to sign the new law Wednesday.

This, combined with the President's decision to call up 19-year-olds first, eliminates much of the hardship, inequity and uncertainty which has prevailed in the draft. It was a simple, small step—but it will mean a lot to the men and families who have to face this problem.

DRAFT LOTTERY SET TO GO

WASHINGTON.—The 12,500 young men in the January draft call will be inducted according to "the luck of the draw."

This measure will be the result of a measure, signed by President Nixon, which establishes the first congressionally-authorized draft lottery since March 17, 1942.

Under the lottery plan, there will be two drastic changes affecting millions of young Americans:

¶ The draftees will be called up from each year's group of 19-year-olds.

¶ The order in which eligible 19-year-olds will be called up will be determined by "random selection" or lottery.

All of the student deferments presently in force will be continued. These include student deferments, hardship deferments and occupational deferments (industrial farming, teaching, police force).

The 4000 local draft boards will still continue to provide their quotas of men toward the over-all requirements sent out by Selective Service headquarters, after the manpower need is stated by the Defense Dept.

Instead of drafting the oldest first, however, as they did till now, they will be required to draft only 19-year-olds—with the exception of this first year of the lottery.

HOW IT WORKS

If the new plan works as intended, a youth will be vulnerable to the chance of being called up for only one year. Till now he was vulnerable for seven years, from 18 through 25. Under the new plan, if he is not drafted during his one year of exposure, he will not be called up unless there is a major war.

Under the old plan of drafting the oldest first, the majority of the draftees were 20 and 21.

There will be at least two drawings made in the Selective Service headquarters a few blocks from the White House. The first drawing, called the "birthday lottery" will scramble the sequence of the calendar. There will be 366 capsules—one for each day of the year plus one for Feb. 29—and inside each capsule will be a date.

The first capsule drawn might contain the date of June 1. If it does, every youth who turns 19 on June 1 will be drafted unless he has a deferment, or is unqualified because of physical, mental or moral standards. The 366th capsule drawn might contain the date of, say, Feb. 1. If it does, every boy who becomes 19 on that date knows that he will not be called up unless there is a world war.

This is because the men required for the draft, under a limited war such as in Vietnam, can be supplied by the first 100 or so numbers of the priority sequence. Only about 250,000 are expected to be drafted in 1970 out of a draft pool estimated at 850,000.

The second drawing at Selective Service headquarters will be of 26 capsules, each one containing a letter of the alphabet.

This will scramble the alphabet and establish a new priority sequence to establish the order of call within each birthday group. The priority will be determined by the first letter of a man's last name.

[From the Washington Post, Nov. 29, 1969]

LOOPHOLE IN THE DRAFT LOTTERY?

President Nixon acknowledged in signing the bill to permit a Selective Service lottery, that some inequities will remain when the new system is in operation. No law which compels some to render military service and relieves others of that obligation can be entirely fair. The best that can be done, so long as compulsion is necessary, is to make the system operate without favoritism, and use of the combined birthday-alphabet lottery appears to be an appropriate means to that end.

Great care will have to be taken, however, to see that unnecessary inequities do not creep back into the draft. The plan for drafting 19-year-olds first, which will go into effect in 1971, is complicated by the fact that education and job deferments will be granted, and young men who escape inclusion in the prime draft pool at 19 for these reasons will have to face the possibility of being drafted at a later date. Equity demands that after their deferment expires they be exposed to the draft in the so-called prime pool for one year as if they were still 19.

This is the intent of the new arrangement. A question has been raised, however, as to whether deferments can be manipulated so as to grant virtual immunity to the draft. Deferred students and employees will go into the prime draft pool when they lose their deferment. Peter Flanigan of the White House staff dealing with this problem has acknowledged in an interview with the Associated Press that this arrangement may make it possible for a draft-shy student to choose the time of his exposure so as to minimize his liability. In other words, a student, after he learns that his number has been bypassed, could flunk or drop out of college and take his period of exposure to the draft when the chance of his being drafted would be almost nil.

If abuses of this sort should develop under the new system, it could fall into even greater disrepute than its predecessor which is now being discarded. One way of eliminating that risk would be to abolish all deferments for the duration of the war. If that is deemed too drastic it should be possible to require the young man seeking a deferment to specify at that time the year which he would spend in the prime draft pool. Congress will need to take a careful look at this problem when it seeks wider draft reforms next year in accord with the promise of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

DRAFT LOTTERY SET TOMORROW

(By Stan Benjamin)

Tom, Dick and Harry grew up together, went to school together, graduated in the same year—but they may go very separate ways under President Nixon's new draft lottery system.

Tomorrow night the first draft lottery drawing in 27 years will be held; a new drawing will take place every year while this system remains in effect.

Each year a new group of young men will await that drawing, and each year, as the capsules are drawn from the jar, they'll wonder: "What does this do to my future?"

OUTLINES CLEAR

The answer will depend on individual circumstances and a complex of regulations but the general outlines are clear.

Tom, Dick and Harry start out with at least one thing in common: They all must register with their local draft board when they reach the age of 18. What they tell the draft board about themselves will help determine whether they are classified 1–A—"available for military service"—or in one of 16 other classifications of men considered not immediately available.

Let's say Tom and Dick have got jobs, and have nobody to support but themselves. The draft board finds them 1–A.

HARRY IS DEFERRED

Harry, however, is deferred. The draft board is convinced there is good reason not to draft him—at least as long as that reason lasts. Of endless possibilities, the reason may be that he has enrolled in college; perhaps he has a job essential to national security; perhaps he is the sole support of a parent; perhaps he has a trick knee.

The following year, all three youths turn 19. Some time late in that year the Selective Service System in Washington holds the lottery that will affect them.

Each date of the year, including Leap Year's Feb. 29, is written on a slip of paper and placed in a plastic capsule. These 366 capsules are mixed in a large glass jar and then drawn out, one by one.

The first date pulled is labeled number one. The second date pulled becomes number two, and so on up to number 366.

When the new year rolls around, the local draft board starts using this numbered list of dates: all 1–A men whose birthday was drawn first will be the first ones called for service. Then the board goes on to the men whose birthday was drawn second, and so on.

HALFWAY THROUGH LIST

The way draft calls have been adding up in recent years. Most draft boards will probably get all the men they need by the time they are roughly halfway through the list.

Suppose Tom's birthday—a day, for example, in November—is the third or fourth one drawn out of the bowl.

That tells Tom he'd better not make any long-range plans. He's virtually certain to be drafted unless the Army finds something wrong with him when he shows up for his physical.

Dick, on the other hand, has a higher number: let's say, 187, meaning that his birthday was the 187th to come out of the lottery bowl.

Tom is sure to be drafted, and a lot of guys far up the list with numbers in the 200s and 300s probably won't have to go.

WHO WILL BE FIRST?

But Dick is right in the middle. All he can do is sweat out the whole year and see whether the draft calls in his own local board reach his number.

As they climb higher throughout the year, Dick may take a close look and find there are a couple of other guys sharing his birthday and thus his number in line. If it gets that close, who will be the first to go?

That's already decided, too. Selective Service will already have scrambled up alphabet letters, just as it did dates.

NEW GROUP IN FRONT RANK

If necessary, it will use the scrambled alphabet list to decide which man goes first when birthdays coincide, by matching the letters drawn with the initials of the men's last names.

But let's give Dick a break and suppose the draft board gets all its men without reaching him.

Tom and Dick have now faced their "priority" year of exposure to the draft. Tom got drafted. But Dick did not, and the next year a new group of 19-year-olds with their birthdays scrambled in a new lottery will be in the front rank of exposure to the draft.

Dick will then still be legally subject to the draft, but it can't take him unless it first takes all of the new "priority" group, and that's pretty unlikely, short of a huge national mobilization.

Dick can relax and start making long-range plans from then on; he's probably safe from the draft.

He remains subject to it until he reaches the age of 26, but his chance of being called gets smaller each year.

Now what about Harry, the guy who was deferred?

Harry turned 19 the same year as the other two, so he was subject to the same lottery and he, too, got a place-in-line number when his birthday was drawn out of the jar.

But because he is deferred, he does not face the draft when the other two do. He faces it if and when he loses that deferment: when he graduates or drops out of college; loses his "essential" occupation; loses the dependent he had to support; gets his trick knee fixed . . .

When that happens, his draft board may reclassify him 1–A.

Harry then drops into the middle of a "priority" year and is fully exposed to the draft. He drops in, however, with the place in line given to him by the lottery held when he was 19.

If his number then was, for example, 153, he enters the 1–A line at number 153, even several years later.

If that number is reached in the year he re-enters the 1-A pool, Harry gets drafted.

FIRST YEAR DIFFERENT

The Nixon plan is to give every Tom, Dick and Harry his "priority" draft exposure in the year after he turns 19—unless, like Harry, he postpones that exposure through a deferment.

This year, the first lottery year, is a little different because men are eligible for the draft from 19 to 26, and the administration wants today's 20-to-26 group to get its exposure just like the 19-to-20 group.

Thus the first drawing—at 8 p.m. tomorrow—covers every man who reaches 19, but not 26, by or on Dec. 31, 1969.

The draft boards won't start calling men by the lottery list until January, but by late tomorrow night, Tom, Dick and Harry will have a pretty good idea where they stand in 1970.

[From the National Journal, Nov. 29, 1969]

FURTHER DRAFT DEBATE EXPECTED AS PRESIDENT SIGNS REVISIONS

(By Donald May)

The series of steps which President Nixon has taken to revise the draft has not ended the national debate on that subject.

More major national decisions on the draft are yet to be made. The President himself reflected this in signing a draft lottery bill Nov. 26 when he commented:

"While this measure will remove a great number of inequities . . . We will not be satisfied until we can have what I advocated during the campaign, volunteer armed forces."

So far the President has:

Cut draft calls by 50,000 in the final quarter of this year and announced that the call of 35,000 men planned for January will be reduced to 12,500.

Signed—also on Nov. 26—an executive order designed to cut the seven years of draft uncertainty, which men now face under the oldest-first system, to one year by calling 19-year-olds first beginning in January.

Coaxed and prodded through Congress an amendment permitting selection of 19-year-olds by lottery.

Announced that Lieut. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, who has headed the Selective Service System since 1941, will give up that post Feb. 16.

But these steps left draft critics in both houses of Congress calling for more. Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., urged "total revision." In the House, Rep. Leonard Farbstein, D–N.Y., said "a host of other inequities" remained unsolved, the greatest of which he said was "the draft itself."

Further inquiry: Two Administration studies related to the draft are now in progress:

The President's Commission on an All-Volunteer Armed Force, named in March, and headed by former Defense Secretary Thomas S. Gates, plans a January report on the possibility of a volunteer force to replace the draft.

A continuing Defense Department study called Project Volunteer, is looking into ways of gradually decreasing reliance on the draft by improving pay, recruiting systems, living accommodations and education opportunities for volunteers.

Divided Congress: The Administration found that it is no easy task obtaining draft legislation from a Congress split between those who want major revision and those who want little or none.

On May 13 the President asked Congress for six-point legislation including the youngest-first system, a lottery and deferment changes.

What happened next varies with the telling. Draft reformers say the measure was blocked by the chairmen of the two Armed Services Committees, Sen. John C. Stennis, D-Miss., and Rep. L. Mendel Rivers, D-S.C. The Stennis-Rivers forces say they didn't want the draft thrown open to helter-skelter revision on the floors of Congress, without full hearings, and while emotions on the draft, Vietnam and the military were running high.

Rivers, who had written much of the existing 1967 draft law which banned a lottery, told the Administration it could make its main changes by executive order without need of legislation.

On Sept. 19 the President yielded to this, announcing that he would handle five of his six points by executive decree, and would ask Congress only for one amendment—to remove the 1967 prohibition against a lottery.

Even getting this much to a vote seems to have taken some Presidential persuasion, as evidenced by the following remark of House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford: "This bill . . . is here only because the distinguished chairman of this committee (Rivers) sat down with the President of the United States and at his request agreed to hold hearings on this proposal and to bring it to the floor, if that was the will of the committee . . ."

On Oct. 13 the President sent a message to Congress outlining legislative priorities and calling for draft legislation "now."

On Oct. 30 the lottery bill reached the House floor under a rule preventing amendment on the floor. Sources said this rule was an essential condition for a vote. The bill passed 382–13.

Enter Sen. Kennedy: Then it almost foundered in the Senate. Under Senate procedure there could be no rule against floor amendment, only a gentlemen's agreement. But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., wanted to launch a debate on major draft revision.

According to opponents, Sen. Stennis took the position that in that case there could be no bill. Sen. Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., the majority leader, reported on the Senate floor that it appeared the bill could not come up this year for lack of an agreement on limiting amendments.

President Nixon then turned on the heat, and he turned it on Mansfield. "I deeply regret the announced decision of the Democratic leadership to deny the United States Senate an opportunity to consider draft reform until next year," the President said.

There followed a series of Kennedy-Stennis meetings. Yale President Kingman Brewster Jr. attempted—during a hearing—to mediate. He suggested a compromise involving an earlier expiration of the draft law. It was not accepted, but it drew public attention to the need for compromise.

Finally, Kennedy agreed not to start his debate. Stennis agreed to hold draft hearings by Feb. 15. The lottery bill passed the Senate by voice vote Nov. 19.

Revision pressure: The renewed debate, when it comes, is likely to be extensive. This year a dozen draft revision bills were introduced in the Senate. They included a lottery, an extensive revision proposed by Sen. Kennedy, and an all-volunteer force proposed by Sen. Mark O. Hatfield, R-Ore. In the House there were at least 42 draft bills.

Draft reform mail to legislators is reported heavy, and this may have been a factor in decisions in both houses to pass the lottery bill.

Significance: Two million young men reach draft age each year. More than a quarter million are being called this year. Draftees represent 35 per cent of Army forces in Vietnam.

The draft issue is bound up in and has fueled the campus revolt, the Vietnam protest movement and it has touched on the racial issue. There have been charges that the draft discriminates against the poor and blacks. Some have attacked the idea of an all-volunteer force on the grounds it would be heavily black, a premise which proponents do not concede.

For President Nixon the draft is a top priority problem, but one for which proposed solutions run into harsh realities of Pentagon manpower needs and budgets. Soon after he took office, Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird, decided an all-volunteer force was too costly to be more than a long-range goal.

One social dimension is a ten-fold increase (from 341 to more than 3,000) in the number of men charged with criminal violations of the draft act between 1965 and 1969. Many are men with otherwise clean records who were influenced by campus protests.

Court cases: The U.S. Supreme Court has several draft cases on its docket raising issues such as:

The constitutionality of "punitive" reclassification of a man to 1–A for failure to carry his draft card—specifically, for turning it in as a form of protest. (No. 71 Gutnecht v US; No. 65 Breen v Selective Service Board No. 16.)

Whether a man who opposes the Vietnam war on non-religious grounds can qualify as a conscientious objector. (No. 305 US v Sisson.)

Draft groups: The increase in draft calls during the Vietnam war has caused rapid expansion of a social phenomenon known as "draft counseling"—similar to tax advice and considered by the Selective Service System as just as legal when properly done.

The Central Committee for conscientious objectors handles between 900 and 1,200 consultations with draft age men per month by mail, phone and interview at its Philadelphia headquarters. It has branches in Chicago and San Francisco.

The interest of a wide variety of groups is shown by a partial list of those which presented information to the Gates commission: American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, National Student Association, Young Americans for Freedom, National Council of Churches, Air Force Association, Council to Repeal the Draft.

Outlook: Among other issues unaffected by the President's actions so far are charges that the more than 4,000 local draft boards operate without uniform criteria and with inadequate judicial review; that men have been drafted as punishment for protest, and that the area of conscientious objection has not been adequately defined.

When the issues next come up in Congress there will be one important difference—1970 will be a Congressional election year.

HERE'S HOW DRAFT WILL WORK

WASHINGTON.—Tomorrow night the first draft lottery drawing in 27 years will be held. Here's how it will work:

Between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m. at Selective Service headquarters in Washington, a person or persons yet unidentified will draw slips or tags from a new glass bowl. The slips will be numbered from 1 through 366, one for each day of the year, including leap year's Feb. 29.

The order of the drawing will determine the order of induction for young men, found physically and mentally qualified, who were born from Jan. 1, 1944 through Dec. 31, 1950—ages 19 through 25.

Thus if No. 300 is the first number drawn, then all men whose birthdays fall on the 300th day of the year—Oct. 26—will be first to be called for induction. If No. 5 is the second drawn, all men whose birthday is Jan. 5 would be next to be drafted.

Because of the total number of men in the draft pool, it is likely that men whose birthdays are not drawn in the first half of the listing will escape service.

The order of induction established tomorrow night will be valid for one year. The next drawing will be held around Dec. 1, 1970.

Next year, however, after Dec. 1, 1970, only the 19-year-olds or those who become 19 during the year will be placed in the eligible pool, where they will remain for one year only.

College deferments for undergraduate work will still be granted, but when a deferment is ended by dropout or graduation, the deferred student—regardless of age—will enter the 19-year-old eligible group for one year.

When the drawing by calendar days is completed tomorrow night, officials will stage a second drawing from a scrambled list of the 26 letters of the alphabet.

The alphabet sequence thus established will be used by local boards to determine the order of induction within the list of those men having the same birthday. If the first calendar day drawn is 366, and the first letter drawn is B, then the first men to be drafted will be those whose names begin with B who were born on Dec. 31.

Draft boards will then use the first letter of the last name of the inductee at first. But where there is duplication, the boards will then go to the first letter of the first name.

Local boards will continue to register, classify, and defer men at the age of 18. Each month, the boards will notify the state board of the number of men examined and qualified as 1–A, and this total will then be submitted to the national headquarters.

When the Defense Department submits a monthly call to Selective Service headquarters, this request is pro-rated to the states, which in turn pro-rate the quotas to local boards. The national headquarters allows credit to the states for men in service in assigning quotas and, similarly, state boards make such an allowance in fixing quotas for local boards.

DRAFT: NOW THE LOTTERY BUT IS IT ENOUGH?

(By Senator EDWARD M. KENNEDY)

WASHINGTON.—On Tuesday the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence urged the adoption of broad draft reforms to help "reduce the tensions and frustrations that now lead some young men" to violence. The draft, the commission statement said, is "a significant focal point of dissent" and "symbolizes the inflexibility of our institutions."

On Wednesday, President Nixon took two important steps towards draft reform:

(1) He signed into law a one-sentence bill giving him the authority to establish any sequence he desires for inducting young men into the armed forces; and

(2) He issued an executive order establishing a lottery to determine this sequence, and limiting exposure to the draft to one year (instead of seven years as under the present system).

And tomorrow, the Selective Service System will actually conduct the lottery. It will be the nation's first lottery since World War I, and will determine the order in which 250,000 young men in 1970 will receive Uncle Sam's "greetings."

The lottery is an important reform. It sets up an objective procedure for choosing some few men to be inducted, from among a large group of men all equally eligible. The Department of Defense estimates that 850,000 men will be eligible in 1970, but that it will need to draft only 250,000, or 29 per cent. Since the lottery is inherently objective, it will choose this 29 per cent without regard to race, income, connections or education.

But nearly two million young men turn 19 each year. Why is it that only 850,000 are eligible? First, only 63 per cent of this nearly two million will be able to pass the medical, mental and moral tests. In other words, 32 per cent of our annual crop of 19-year-olds simply do not qualify for military service even if they volunteer. (It is interesting to note that 66 per cent of Negro draftees in Mississippi failed these tests, and 65 per cent in New Jersey and 69 per cent in Oregon; the comparable figures for whites are 40 per cent; 44 per cent; and 44 per cent.)

Thus some 1.4 million men will theoretically be eligible in 1970, from which to choose the necessary 250,000. But for those affluent or clever enough, or well enough advised, to win them, there are deferments—for college, for occupation, for fatherhood, for agriculture, for hardship and so on. Deferments are good insulation against the draft, and one deferment can often be parlayed into another to become a virtual exemption. If only 850,000 are eligible for the draft next year, instead of 1.4 million, it is principally because of the various deferments.

Yet there are no uniform guidelines for most deferments. Instead, each of the nearly 4,100 local boards uses its own interpretation of "community needs" to decide which boys are deferred and which are drafted. Furthermore, if a boy is not rich and clever, there is no due process protection of his interests in the decision-making of the Selective Service System.

Consequently, those who favor a reformed draft urge that these further steps be taken:

Eliminate occupational deferments. The National Security Council and the previous Secretary of Labor have both said there was no national interest requirement in continuing them.

Establish uniform guidelines. Since local boards have virtually no substantive guidelines for their decisions, it is not surprising that variability between the boards is the rule rather than the exception.

Provide due process. The protections so much a part of a democratic society—personal appearance, written opinion, right to counsel, right to call witnesses—are simply unavailable in an appeal of a local board decision. This is shocking and must be reversed.

There are other important reforms many feel are badly needed—streamlining the structure of the draft system, naming members of local boards under 30 years of age, and bringing an end to college deferments in times of war.

There is also the problem of closing the loophole opened by the President's executive order. Under its provisions, a young man with a deferment can choose which year to terminate the deferment and enter the draft pool. He will, in all likelihood, choose a year in which the lottery has made the odds strongly against his being called. Because he can choose which year to terminate his deferment, he can beat the draft, but not everyone can win a deferment.

It would be comfortable if there were no draft, and the manpower needs of the armed forces were met through voluntary enlistments. It is entirely possible, furthermore, to construct a system after Vietnam in which draftees are not necessary, and manpower needs are filled by volunteers.

But there are a number of grave questions about an all-volunteer army.

Would it be an army of professional mercenaries, as such armies are called in other countries?

Would it be all-black and all-poor, as the army induced volunteers through higher pay, and as re-enlistment statistics suggest?

Would it cost from $4- to $17-billion additional each year, as Defense Department studies indicate, and is it worth that allocation of our scarce resources?

Would it act as a stimulus to undertake foreign military adventures, as its leadership cadre sought to give effect to its military training and experience?

Would we lose an important constraint on foreign policy decisions because civilians would not then have to run the risk of involvement in limited military efforts?

Would it widen the gulf between the civilian and the military, as it lost the leaven of being a citizen's army?

And ultimately, how would such an army react in Songmy? How would it react after Songmy?

The draft is important not only because it collides with the life of every young man in this country. It is important not only because one out of every three army deaths in Vietnam is a draftee. Its ultimate importance lies in its compulsory nature, which is an abridgement of the traditional democratic freedoms.

If a democracy's citizens are convinced such an abridgement is necessary, then they will tolerate it if it is equitable. But when its necessity rests on an unpopular war, and when it is unfair and discriminatory in application, then it is almost surprising the nation has not seen a repetition of the draft riots which paralyzed New York City for three days just over 100 years ago.

Or have we?

HOW IT WILL WORK

When the Selective Service System conducts its lottery tomorrow, it will pick in random sequence both the days of the year and the letters of the alphabet.

The list it publishes for the days of the year will no longer run straight through Jan. 1 to Dec. 31. Instead the 365 days will appear in random sequence. Similarly, the alphabet will not appear from A to Z, but will also be in random sequence.

These two sequences will determine the order in which eligible men are inducted until the draft requirements for the year are filled. Thus those far down on the list are unlikely to be called at all. If two men from the same local draftboard have the same birthday, but only one is needed, then the random alphabetical sequence controls, calling up the one whose first letter of his last name is listed higher.

Through 1970, the eligible men aged 19 through 25 will be subject to the lottery. Beginning in 1971, only 19-year-olds will be subject to the lottery, plus those whose deferments have expired. Eligibility is limited to one twelve-month period.

[From the Washington (D.C.) Post, Dec. 1, 1969]

NEW DRAFT LOTTERY TO START MONDAY

(By George Lardner Jr.)

The shiny plastic capsules look like little containers full of charms that used to sell for a nickel in candy store coin machines.

For some, they promise civilian clothes for life. For others, they mean duty in Vietnam; for still others, a year-long guessing game.

The military draft is going back to the "fishbowl" lotteries reminiscent of World War I and World War II.

The lottery will start Monday night when 366 blue capsules are dumped into a big glass bowl at the Selective Service System's national headquarters here.

Each will contain a gummed sticker with a date on it, including a Feb. 29 slip for leap year. One by one, they will be plucked out for posting—in the order drawn—on a light blue tote board.

The Nixon administration calls it "the Random Selection sequence" and it has been designed to reduce the period of uncertainty about the draft from seven years to a single year.

The drawing itself will be simple enough. Officials expect it to take only two hours. But the picking order that it establishes can be complicated. In fact, it does not appear to have been entirely settled.

The first steps, however, are clear enough. The dates represent birthdays, and Monday night's lottery will affect some 850,000 young men in the 19-to-26 age group.

Under the new setup, the drawing should determine approximately when they can expect their induction notices, if at all.

If March 3, for example, is the first date drawn, draft-age youth born on that day will be called up first.

Should a local draft board have more than enough men to fill its quota, the lottery will again decide which ones are to be drafted. Once the glass bowl is empty of dates, another 26 capsules—each with a letter of the alphabet—will be dropped into it, stirred with an old butter paddle, and drawn out.

If the first letter is, say, "D," the local draft board's John Doe with a March 3 birthday will be at the top of his draft board's call list for the year 1970.

He may not be called, though, because of a deferment—for college or some other reason. But if the deferment expires before his 26th birthday, he will still be subject to the draft—during the year he becomes 1–A again—before anyone else at his local board because of his ranking in the lottery drawing during his first year of eligibility.

So it will go down the line—birthday by birthday, letter by letter. Those born on the last date scooped out of the glass bowl won't be called unless military requirements rise astronomically over next year's expected draft of 250,000 men.

WAITING IT OUT

But suppose March 3 is pulled out when the bowl is half empty. It is assigned No. 183 on the call list. Without a deferment, all John Doe can do is wait it out for the year and see what happens.

If he gets through the year without a notice from his draft board, he can probably forget about military service. For 1970, his chances are about even. Officials suggest that current draft needs should be exhausted when they get about halfway down the call list.

Monday's drawing, according to one reported breakdown, will fix the order of call for some 400,000 young men who turned 19 this year; another 250,000 between 20 and 26 who have no deferments, and about 200,000 in the same age bracket who do have deferments.

NEW LOTTERY EACH YEAR

After this, the administration plans to hold a new lottery each year for those who turned 19 the year before. Their so-called "priority" exposure to the draft (an unforeseen war could change it all) will last for a year, and no longer, unless they put it off with a deferment.

Each lottery, of course, will establish a fresh priority list of birthdays for that year's draft calls. Those who become 19 during 1970 will get their number in a drawing next fall. Local boards will put primary reliance on that for draft calls in 1971 when 19-year-olds are to be inducted first.

This is where some of the complications come in. Say Aug. 10 is the first date drawn at the lottery for 1971. What happens to those with March 3 birthdays, fixed as No. 1 in the first drawing, whose deferments expire in 1971? Selective Service boards across the country could wind up with an escalating number of No. 1 dates, No. 2 dates, and so forth.

"That's one of the things we are going to have to get straightened out," Capt. William S. Pascoe, Selective Service information chief, said yesterday. "It's a good question. I'm going to write the General (Selective Service Director Lewis B. Hershey) a note about it."

OTHER ISSUES UNSETTLED

Other issues remain unsettled, too. According to an Associated Press dispatch, quoting White House staff expert Peter Flanigan, a draft-age youth with a college or occupational deferment could wait until the waning months of a calendar year when it is apparent his number will not come up.

The youngster could then drop out of school or quit his job, and end his draft liability within a month or two, Flanigan acknowledged.

But Selective Service officials apparently disagree, contending that the "exposure" is supposed to last a full 12 months, no matter when it starts. "That's another thing we're going to have to get straightened out," Pascoe said.

The problems, however, appear to lie primarily in the years ahead rather than Monday's lottery for 1970. Local draft boards will start calling men by the list it sets Jan. 1.

Should those with top-priority birthdays be passed by in January's call because their local board has more than enough men on the list, they will still be subject to the quotas in the months ahead—until the year is done, Pascoe said.

The drawing itself will be done entirely by young men and women representing the Selective Service Youth Advisory Groups recently organized at President Nixon's behest.

The Illinois contingent, however, is reportedly boycotting the lottery and urging their counterparts in other states and draft regions, such as the District of Columbia, to follow suit.

The 13-member Illinois youth committee was said to feel that Mr. Nixon was trying to compromise their status as gadflies for a better system.

TRADITION STARTED IN 1917

Earlier draft lotteries were launched by high government officials. Secretary of War Newton D. Baker started the tradition in 1917 when he was led blindfolded to a glass container in the old Senate Office Building to pick the first of thousands of draftees for World War I.

The drawing took longer, but it was more clearcut. Officials and some chosen students, simply plucked out gelatin capsules containing the individual draft numbers of men who had just been registered with their local boards.

Two more drawings were held before the war came to an end and the ceremonial bowl was shipped to Independence Hall in Philadelphia until it was called back for another tour of duty.

That began in 1940 with the first peacetime draft in the nation's history. President Franklin D. Roosevelt looked on as Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson hauled out the first number on the stage of the Labor Department's big auditorium.

Two more "fishbowl" drawings were held, in 1941 and again in 1942, before the manpower demands of World War II became so great that the lottery was abandoned.

President Nixon ordered it back into vogue last Wednesday when he signed the law authorizing it and set the stage for Monday's production. It may be the only one that could result in duty in Vietnam for those at the top of the list. Some experts have predicted that drafted men would not be sent there after next year.

As a general rule of thumb, it is estimated that those whose birthdays are among the first third to be drawn will definitely be drafted, those in the next third have "an average probability" of being called, and those in the final third, a low probability.

Gen. Hershey, the controversial, 76-year-old draft director who will be leaving the post in February, ordered a new glass bowl for the occasion. Two feet tall and 16 inches in diameter, it looks like a water cooler without a top. The old "fishbowl" will sit outside in the glass case that now houses it at the Selective Service building here.

Hershey, a spokesman said, didn't want to use it again because it was a symbol of the past.

"The old one was used at the start of wars," the aide explained. "We hope this one is going to be used for the end of war."

DRAWING TONIGHT WILL DETERMINE WHO IS DRAFTED

First Lottery Since '42 Set for 8 P.M. in Washington—Affects Calls in '70—Induction by Chance—Men Between 19 and 26 to Be Chosen or Spared by Luck of Their Birthday

(By David E. Rosenbaum)

WASHINGTON, November 30.—A chance drawing tomorrow night will determine which young men of hundreds of thousands will be drafted into military service and which, by luck of birthday, will be left free to work, study and lead uninterrupted civilian lives.

When the lottery is completed late tomorrow night, every man between the ages of 19 and 26 will have a general, though not precise, idea of whether or not he will be drafted.

The lottery, the first since 1942, will begin at 8 P.M. in the small auditorium of the Selective Service System's national headquarters at 1724 F Street in Washington.

On a table at the front of the room will sit a cylindrical glass bowl—looking something like a water-cooler—containing 366 capsules. In each capsule will be a piece of sticky paper with a date written on it.

DATES TO BE POSTED

As the capsules are drawn, the dates will be removed and posted on a board in the order in which they are picked next to a series of numbers ranging from 1 to 366 Potential draftees will be chosen, starting in January, in the order in which their birthdays were drawn.

As an example, if the first date drawn is March 20, every man between 19 and 26 whose birthday is March 20 will be given No. 1, and each draft board will choose all men with No. 1 (who are not deferred or exempt from the draft) before it chooses a man with No. 2.

Administration officials say that, as a general rule for the first lottery, men drawing the lowest third of the numbers—roughly 1 through 122—can be certain that they will be drafted. Men drawing the highest third of the numbers—roughly 244 through 366—can be assured that they will be passed by. For those in the middle, there will be a year of uncertainty.

In addition to the drawing of the 366 dates, the 26 letters of the alphabet will be chosen at random to determine the order of call within a given birthday.

The lottery does not affect deferments or exemptions at all. A man who now has a deferment—because he is a student, because he has a critical occupation, or whatever—can retain his deferment. But he will be assigned a number in tomorrow's lottery, and the number he gets will stay with him. When his deferment lapses, his draft board will be required to select him before it takes a man with a higher number.

SECOND LOTTERY NEXT FALL

Next fall, the birthdays will be reshuffled, and there will be another lottery for 1971. Next year's drawing will affect only men whose 19th birthday is in 1970—in other words, only men born in 1951.

Tomorrow's lottery affects every man born between Jan. 1, 1944, and Dec. 31, 1950. The Government estimates there are 850,000 of these men who are not deferred or exempt from the draft. About 250,000 will be drafted next year. The rest will be free from the draft forever, unless there is a national emergency, or if the law is changed to affect them, which is unlikely.

Tomorrow night, the capsules will be drawn by more than 50 representatives of the Selective Service System's Youth Advisory Councils. At the urging of President Nixon, Selective Service set up the councils this year in each state and territory. The councils consist of youths of draft age. Officials expect the lottery to be finished within two hours.

Officials of the television and radio networks said today that they would not decide until tomorrow how much, if any, of the drawing would be broadcast. A spokesman for the Columbia Broadcasting System said the tentative plans were to break into regular television programs with short announcements on the progress of the lottery.

HOW DEFERMENTS WORK

To show how deferments work under the lottery system, take, for example, the case of John Doe, a college undergraduate with a student deferment and Sept. 12 as a birthday.

If Sept. 12 is the 100th number drawn tomorrow night, John Doe will be assigned No. 100. As long as he retains his deferment—it cannot be done past the age of 24 under the current law affecting student deferments—he will not be drafted, even though all eligible men with No. 100 are taken.

Men in future lotteries with Sept. 12 as a birthday will be assigned another number, maybe higher or maybe lower than 100. But this makes no difference to John Doe. He will always have No. 100, and, in whichever year his deferment lapses, he will be considered with all other men with No. 100.

If John Doe loses his deferment in the middle of the year, it still makes no difference, for in the next draft call after he loses the deferment, his draft board will take him if No. 100 has been reached or passed and not draft him if No. 100 has not been reached in the sequences.

It will still be possible, however, for a man to keep a job deferment—many young men receive them for teaching—until his 26th birthday and avoid the draft entirely.

A POSSIBLE LOOPHOLE

A possible loophole that arises has been discussed in depth within the Government in recent days. A man with a borderline number—one that might be reached in some years and not in others, depending on the size of draft calls—could retain his deferment until late in the year.

If it appears, say in October, that his number was going to be reached, he would retain his deferment and hope that the number was not reached in a subsequent year. If, the next year, it appeared late in the year that his number was not going to be called, he could give up his student or job deferment and enter the draft pool. If the number was not called, he would be free.

Government experts believe, however, that this is really not a loophole. They feel, first of all, that it could only affect a very small number of men, those who had numbers that were likely to be called in some years and not in others.

Secondly, they say, it often takes several months for a draft board to process a man's request that his deferment be dropped and that he be reclassified. By the time it became apparent that his number was not going to be called in a given year, it would probably be too late in the year for him to enter the draftable pool.

If the lottery system of chance seems unfair, it is generally agreed that the random system is more equitable than the old system. Its primary advantage is that it limits to one year the period in which a person is liable to be drafted and it makes that year the one in which his 20th birthday occurs, a time when most men are not set in their careers. If a person wishes, through deferments, to shift his year of liability to a later year, it is by his own choice.

Under the old method, men were susceptible to the draft up to the age of 26, with the oldest men drafted first. Since, in theory, every man at some point became the oldest 25-year-old, every man without a deferment or an exemption was likely to be drafted. Frequently, he was not called until he approached his 26th birthday, a time when his career could be seriously interrupted. And the period of uncertainty lasted for seven years, from his 19th birthday to his 26th.

The National Advisory Commission on Selective Service, appointed by President Johnson in 1966 and headed by Burke G. Marshall, an Assistant Attorney General in the Kennedy Administration, strongly recommended a random selection system. President Johnson endorsed the lottery system in a message to Congress in 1967.

Congress, especially the House Armed Services Committee, was cool to the lottery proposal, however. The main argument was that it would hurt officer procurement. In other words, if a person survived the lottery when he was 19, he would be unlikely to be interested in becoming an officer when he left college.

KENNEDY IN VANGUARD

To keep President Johnson from instituting the lottery by executive action, Congress included in the 1967 draft extension bill a sentence that prohibited the President from establishing a random system without prior Congressional approval.

But pressure for the lottery continued. The drive was led in Congress by Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. Gradually, the military decided that a lottery would not severely damage officer programs, and the military saw an advantage in drafting 19- and 20-year-old men, rather than older men whom it considers more difficult to train.

During his election campaign, President Nixon repeatedly advocated an all-volunteer army. Observing that the needs of the Vietnam war made the draft a necessity, he proposed major draft reform legislation—including a lottery—early in his administration.

APPEAL BY NIXON

Since the over-all reform bill was going nowhere in the Armed Services Committees, Mr. Nixon asked Congress in September to pass a bill that would remove the prohibition against the establishment of a lottery on his own.

While there was general support of this legislation from Senator John C. Stennis, Democrat of Mississippi, and Representative L. Mendel Rivers, Democrat of South Carolina, who are chairmen of the two Armed Services Committees, supporters of a wider reform opposed the new bill. Led by Senator Kennedy, they argued that passage of the lottery this year would preclude substantial reforms of the system next year.

A turning point came early this month when Kingman Brewster, Jr., the president of Yale University, testified before the Senate committee. He said: "I think this bright, cynical generation of students is not going to appreciate the fact that the opportunity for meaningful reform fell by the wayside because of a desire to do more than could be realistically done this session."

Senator Kennedy was apparently convinced. He obtained an agreement from Senator Stennis to hold extensive draft hearings next year, and the bill easily passed the House and Senate. President Nixon signed the legislation last Wednesday and issued an executive order implementing the lottery.

A lottery draft system is not something new in American history. In 1917, shortly after the United States entered World War I, draftees were chosen by lot. Again in 1940, through 1942, draftees were chosen by means of a lottery.

In both World War I and World War II, the random selection system was abandoned when military needs became so great that all eligible men were inducted into the service.

DRAFT LOTTERY BEGINS TONIGHT AT 8; 56 YOUTHS TO DRAW

WASHINGTON.—At 8 p.m. tonight, a young man will step up to a glass jar at Selective Service headquarters, stick his hand down among 366 plastic capsules and draw one out to begin the nation's first draft lottery since the dark days of World War II.

It will be a picture from the history books—like the one showing War Secretary Henry L. Stimson pulling a green capsule from a "fishbowl" in 1940—or the one depicting a blindfolded War Secretary Newton D. Baker reaching into the same fishbowl in 1917.

But there will be an important difference. Tonight's scene, in more or less the same form, will be repeated every year from now on, unless the law is changed or President Nixon fulfills his announced desire for an all-volunteer army.

And the concept of tonight's drawing is unlike all the previous in an attempt to come up with as fair a lottery as has been devised.

There will be 56 youth representatives at the drawing. They will draw, and continue drawing, until all 366 capsules have been opened. Each capsule contains a date of the year, including Feb. 29 even if there is no Feb. 29 in the year's calendar. The dates are placed on a list in the order drawn, and men will be called for induction in the order that the date of their birth falls on that list.

Thus if Feb. 8 is the first date drawn, all men whose birthdates are Feb. 8 will be at the top of the heap for callup during 1970. Those whose birthdates fall in the middle of the list will face uncertainty as to whether they will be called, and those at the bottom will be almost assured they will not be called up.

Those affected by tonight's drawing are all nondeferred men who will have turned 19 by the end of 1969, up to and including all who will still be aged 25 when the year ends. Those who turn 19 or lose deferment by, for example, graduating from college, at any time during 1970, will have to wait for the lottery at the end of that year to enter the pool.

From 1971 onward, the lottery pool will include only those who turned 19 the year before, or those whose deferments have been removed.

Although the change in selection is a new one, the draft is an old practice in the United States. In colonial times villages were authorized to force men of the towns to train for defense against the Indians. And the first Federal draft, imposed by President Abraham Lincoln during the Civil War, produced riots among the poor because the rich were allowed to buy their way out.

World War I brought the first national draft system, with each man from the ages of 21 to 30 assigned a draft number. It was from among 10,500 such numbers that the blindfolded Baker pulled the first one, No. 258.

A similar assigned number system was used when Stimson reached into the jar on Oct. 29, 1940, and pulled out No. 158. That drawing lasted 17 hours and was followed by two others, the last one on March 7, 1942.

DRAFT LOTTERY: AREA'S ELIGIBLE MEN PONDER THEIR FUTURE

(By B. D. Colen)

For 850,000 young American males, 8 p.m. tonight is the hour of decision.

At that hour, their weeks, months, and for some, years of indecision about and evasion of the Selective Service System will come to a head.

Tonight is the night when, one by one, 366 clear plastic capsules, each containing a slip of paper with a date on it, will be drawn from a large glass jar. The order in which the dates are drawn will determine a young man's chances of being drafted during his years of eligibility. Those whose birthdays are drawn first will be first eligible.

For Robert Gill, a 21-year-old George Washington University senior, tonight presents special problems. He has a student deferment from his Lyons, Kansas, draft board, but he is considering enlisting in the Army. His luck in the draw tonight may help him make up his mind.

"I'm still thinking about enlisting," he said as he sat studying yesterday afternoon in the GW library reading room. "I'd like to get into a program like the Army foreign language school."

Gill is opposed to the war in Vietnam and marched during the Oct. 15 Moratorium but he doesn't agree with those who say "that all war is bad or the military per se is evil." The draft lottery, he said, "is quite a bit better than the old system," because it lets a person know where he stands.

Tom Costello, a 21-year-old waiter at Apple Pie, a Georgetown restaurant, was sitting in a Wisconsin Avenue bar yesterday afternoon talking to friends.

A Georgetown University graduate with a 1-A draft classification, Costello said he was "evading the draft" when asked what he does for a living. "I've put my physical off four times," he said. "I applied for a job with the D.C. police as a deferment, but I made the mistake of telling them that I smoked grass once. I shouldn't have been so honest."

Though the drawing means a great deal to him, the dark-haired young man was unaware of the fact that the drawing is taking place tonight. "They pick them tomorrow?" he asked, his face registering surprise. "I feel much better now. My problems might be solved tomorrow. But of course they might be multiplied."

Mike Ester, a GW senior whose deferment from his Alameda County, Calif., draft board expires in June, discussed the new lottery system as he stood with a friend, Sandra Altman, in front of the reserve desk in GW's library.

"I'm a big fan of the lottery," he said with a smile. "It's almost like a quiz show. It's different." Ester said he wasn't particularly nervous about tonight's event. His future, he said, "is up for grabs, but it (the lottery) gives you a certain amount of time to play with. There's a degree of certainty."

But Ester is not completely happy with the lottery system. It is comparable, he said, to the lottery described by Shirley Jackson in her short story of the same name. In "The Lottery," villagers drew lots each year to see which one of their fellows they would stone to death as a sacrifice.

Sandra Altman, Ester's friend, called the draft lottery "freaky It's this whole probability thing," she said. "It can determine your life or death."

But Ester was thinking about the outcome. And that outcome, he said, may involve a move to Canada.

LUCK-OF-THE-DRAW DRAFT PLAN BEGINS; 2 WEEKS TO SET UP NEW PLAN HERE

(By Matthew V. Storin)

WASHINGTON.—The nation initiated its new draft lottery last night which determined that young men born on Sept. 14 in the years 1944 through 1950 will be the first called to military service next year.

Rep. Alexander Pirnie (R-New York) reached into a huge glass beaker and drew the first birthdate in a ceremony at Selective Service Headquarters here.

The new system, established by Congressional action and a presidential order this year, is designed to draft 19-year-olds first. The present system first takes the oldest available men below age 26.

Selective Service Director Lewis B. Hershey, who will leave his post next February, presided over the ceremony in a small conference room jammed with newsmen, cameras, microphones and Selective Service employees.

After the selection of the first birthdate, subsequent dates were drawn to determine the priority for drafting all eligible young men between the ages of 19 and 26 in 1970.

The event was not without the protest that has marked the history of military conscription in this country.

Fourteen members of the Youth Advisory Committee signed a statement expressing "deep concern" over handling of the drawing.

Larry McKibben of Iowa, held up the proceedings to read the statement, which protested the "total exclusion of two individuals who did not wish to actually draw numbers." The delegates from Michigan and Alaska were not among the advisory members who drew.

Rep. Pirnie was chosen to draw the first birthdate because he is senior Republican member of a House subcommittee on the draft. He had not been listed on the program for the ceremony and his appearance was a surprise to some middle-echelon Selective Service officials.

The glass beaker, which rested upon a small stool from one of the filing rooms in the headquarters, contained 366 blue plastic capsules. Each capsule enclosed a date, including Feb. 29 for leap years.

Those born within the first third of the birthdates drawn last night will almost certainly be called to the service in 1970.

If an individual qualifies for a temporary deferment he will be liable to the draft when the deferment ends. He will retain the priority number which was drawn for his birthdate last night.

Young people who will not become 19 until 1971, however, will have their draft status determined by another draw next year.

Those whose birthdates were in the middle third drawn last night, will retain some chance of being called, depending on the available manpower within their own draft boards, officials said.

Those drawn in the last third can be reasonably sure they will not be called. Under the new system, if a man is not called in his first year of eligibility, his name goes to the bottom of the Selective Service, where it would only be called up in times of national emergency.

The order of call for eligible men having the same birthdate was determined by a drawing of the alphabet last night.

The ceremony began at 8:02 p.m. after Gen. Hershey asked for silence in the crowded room. After a brief invocation by Marine Col. Robert H. Rankin, Gen. Hershey introduced Pirnie. Without saying a word, the lawmaker from Utica, N.Y., reached in for the first blue capsule.

There were no smiles from the participants. Col. Daniel O. Omer called out the results, "Sept. 14."

The draw proceeded rapidly thereafter. The remainder of the dates were drawn by 51 members of the Youth Advisory Committee from throughout the nation.

Massachusetts was represented by Lawrence DiCara, 20, a junior at Harvard. He was the 38th member of the committee to draw. It was likely that those having the birthdates drawn by DiCara would not be called. Before the ceremony, DiCara said: "It makes me feel good that I'm drawing near the end."

But the Dorchester resident said he was not particularly anxious about the drawing because, "the numbers are going to be picked anyway, whether I do it or not."

The representatives of Michigan and Alaska were said by fellow advisory members to have refused to participate after arriving here earlier Monday. The two youths who were not identified by Selective Service officials, reportedly had not been aware of the role they would play in the lottery.

DiCara said some of the participants were concerned that their "hands would be dirty" after drawing capsules that would decide the futures of hundreds of thousands of fellow young people.

The Massachusetts representative said he is against the war in Vietnam and would like to see the pace of troop withdrawals speeded up.

"But I was brought up to believe that when you agree to do something, then you go ahead and do it," DiCara said.

DiCara's birthdate, Apr. 30, was the 208th drawn, which left him likely to be called when his student deferment expires.

When David L. Fowler of Washington came to the lottery beaker to draw his capsules, he said he could not take part and walked on.

John R. Lyne of Kentucky flashed the "V" sign for peace as he drew each of his capsules.

THE LIST: ORDER OF DATES CHOSEN IN LOTTERY

Here's how you stand in the draft for 1970.

Find the date of your birth. Look at the number beside it. That's your position in the draft call.

A number from 1 to 122 means you'll probably be called. A number from 123 to 244 means you may or may not be called. A number from 245 to 366 means you are unlikely to be called.

ORDER OF INITIALS

If two or more men registered with any local draft board have the same birthday, they will be subject to call in an order determined by a second lottery held last night, in which letters of the alphabet were drawn.

Here is the order:

1. J; 2. G; 3. D; 4. X; 5. N; 6. O; 7. Z; 8. T; 9. W.

10. P; 11. Q; 12. Y; 13. U; 14. C; 15. F; 16. I; 17. K; 18. H.

WHAT YOUR DRAFT CHANCES ARE

WASHINGTON.—The birthday lottery drawing involves you if you were born between Jan. 1, 1944, and Dec. 31, 1950.

If your birthday was drawn in the first 122 numbers and you have no deferment it is almost certain you will be called in 1970.

If your birthday was drawn between number 123 through 244, the odds are 50–50 that you'll receive your draft notice. There are varying factors, such as the quotas assigned to your local board, deferments, and your birthday comes high or low on this middle grouping.

If your birthday is drawn in the bottom third, from 245 through 366, there is small likelihood you will be summoned in the draft and you can probably plan your life and career in the knowledge you will have no military service requirement barring national emergencies.

If you are temporarily deferred because of college, your exempt status continues but the priority level in which your birthday falls in the drawing will be effective for the year in which your exemption expires.

Thus, if you should graduate or drop out of college in 1973, if your birthday was the 15th number drawn in yesterday's lottery, you would be placed in the 15th level of call-ups in 1974 even though a different birthday was drawn 15th for that year.

YOUNG MEN LISTEN—FUTURES IN BOWL

(By William A. Davis)

Not since television took over American living rooms 20 years ago has a radio program had so rapt an audience as last night's "lottery show."

The listeners, mostly males between the ages of 19 and 26, sat frozen to their radios waiting for their birthdays to be called and their numbers to come up.

A Brighton man, Timothy Koster, 20, of Sutherland road, didn't have very long to wait.

His birthdate, Sept. 14, was the first one plucked from the "fishbowl" by Cong. Alexander Pirnie (R-N.Y.) and assigned to the callup number: "001."

A freshman at Boston University's College of Business Administration, Koster says he lacks sufficient credits to receive a student deferment and will be eligible for the draft in January.

"I will refuse induction," he said. "I've been against violence all my life and against war in general." Koster said he had planned to apply for a conscientious objector deferment. "I don't think there is much chance of getting one now," he said last night.

Koster said he had also considered emigrating to Canada but rejected the idea of permanent exile. Told that the average sentence for refusing induction is now two to three years, he said: "Maybe Canada would not be so bad."

Listening to the lottery broadcast with Koster was his older brother, Allan, 22, a senior at BU.

"When they pulled my brother's number—I had to laugh," he said, "anybody who came up number one is a loser."

Allan didn't laugh for long.

His own birthdate, June 27, was the 64th called. Since anyone whose number was in the first third of the 366 called is almost certain to be drafted he expects to be called up when he graduates in June.

"I consider myself just as much of a loser as my brother," the older Koster said, "although I'm not drafted yet."

"My brother is totally non-violent—but I'm not," he said, "I could never morally refuse on the grounds of non-violence like my brother . . . it's a hard decision. I'll really have to think about it."

All around Boston, young men settled down in front of radio when the lottery—which was not televised—began at 8 p.m. (With a prayer by a former Marine Corps chaplain.)

At BU's George Sherman Student Union, knots of students sat in the corridors and listened to the drawing, which was piped over the loudspeaker system by the campus radio station, WBOR.

The earlier numbers provoked groans and cries of "Oh, No"—the later ones gleeful shouts of "Whoopee."

"I guess it beats the election returns," said John Cogar of College Park, Md.

Neal Stillman of Portland, Me., paced up and down as the list of numbers droned on. "I can't listen to this, it make me sick," he said as he walked away—to return seconds later.

"Are you worried?" he was asked. "Damn right I'm worried," he growled.

A Harvard junior, Howe McCarthy of San Francisco, Calif. found out that he has the luckiest birthday of them all, June 8—the very last number called.

McCarthy's interest in the lottery was only curiosity since he's not likely to be drafted. An Army veteran, he spent a year as a first lieutenant with the 9th Infantry Division in Vietnam.

SEGREGATION IN THE SCHOOL DISTRICTS OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, in order to put before the Senate all the facts necessary for full consideration of amendments I intend to offer to the Health, Education, and Welfare appropriations bill, I present today information relative to the school system of the State of New Jersey.

These facts show there is segregation in the public schools of New Jersey that equals, if not surpasses, segregation in many of the schools that are now under the most demanding orders of HEW and the courts in the South.

I emphasize that if segregation is wrong in the public schools of the South, it is wrong in the public schools of all other States.

This opinion is shared by Mr. Leon Panetta, Director, Office for Civil Rights of HEW.

In testimony before the House Appropriations Committee on April 30—page 1061, House Appropriations Committee hearings, HEW 1970—Mr. Panetta made the following statement:

> I talked with a number of people who feel that the Civil Rights Act only aims at the dual school structure and that it really only aims at the Southern situation. It does not say that and I think it talks in terms of discrimination per se, which can occur anywhere regardless of geographic boundaries.

However, Mr. Panetta also said of civil rights enforcement in northern public schools, "there never really was a northern program until the last year."

I emphasize this, Mr. President, and also point out that even within the last year little, if anything, has been done to effectively remove segregation in the North.

For instance, since the civil rights law was passed as of October 16 of this year, in the North only 46 of 7,015 compliance agreements filed have been given a preliminary check by HEW.

In the South, 2,994 districts have filed form 441 and all have been checked, 100 percent. That is according to the records; that is not an estimate. It is according to the records; 1,107 districts have filed form 441–B outlining a voluntary desegregation plan.

In the North only, six out of 7,015 total districts of the North have been sent letters of noncompliance.

In the South, 568 out of 1,107 school districts of the South have been sent letters of noncompliance.

In the North and West, only one out of 7,015 school districts have been the subject of administrative action by HEW.

The tragedy of this so-called crusade against discrimination on a sectional basis is that it is within itself discrimination against a geographical section of the United States.

It might be claimed that segregation in New Jersey is accidental and not the result of official State and local government action. Such, however, is not the case as it has been made clear by the Civil Rights Commission and their report on racial isolation, 1967, at page 42.

According to the Civil Rights Commission, the official policy that had the effect of law in the State of New Jersey as late as 1930 was to operate separate but equal schools when, in the judgment of the board of education, it was best to do so.

In New Jersey, separate schools for Negroes were maintained well into the 20th century despite an 1881 statute prohibiting the exclusion of children from schools on the basis of race. In 1923, the State commissioner of education ruled that local school authorities could provide special schools for Negroes in their residential areas, and allow the transfer of white students from these schools to white schools. The ruling was reaffirmed in 1930. As late as 1940, there were at least 70 separate schools for Negroes in New Jersey.

NEW JERSEY

In New Jersey, according to the 1968–69 HEW school survey, there was a total of 1,234,470 students in the elementary and secondary schools. Of this total, 986,448, or 79 percent, of total enrollment were white, 200,117, or 16 percent, were Negro, and the remaining 5 percent was made up of other minority groups.

HEW's IBM data reflects that there are 24 cities or townships in New Jersey which have one or more schools where Negro students make up 80 percent or more of the total school enrollment, and in these 24 school districts are enrolled 78.7 percent of the total Negro student enrollment in the State of New Jersey. In these 24 cities or school districts, there are 162 schools where the Negro student enrollment is 80 to 100 percent. There are 90,966 Negro students, or 45.4 percent of all Negro students in the State of New Jersey, in these 162 schools. There are 87,645—or 43.8 percent—of the Negro students in the State of New Jersey in 115 schools that are 90 to 100 percent segregated, and there are 68,184—or 34 percent of New Jersey's Negro student population—in 83 schools which are 95 to 100 percent segregated.

For example, Atlantic City has a total school enrollment of 8,605 students, of which 5,357, or 62.3 percent are Negro, and 3,064, or 35.6 percent are white. Atlantic City has five schools with a total enrollment of 2,888, which are practically 100 percent Negro, with 2,883 Negro students and five Spanish Americans. In other words, 53.8 percent of Atlantic City's Negro student population are segregated in five all-Negro schools. There are another four schools, with a total enrollment of 1,829, which are majority Negro schools—from 68.3 to 75.7 percent. There are five majority white schools with a total enrollment of 3,888, of which 2,600 are white, which is 84.8 percent of the total white enrollment. In other words, approximately 15 percent of the white students in Atlantic City attend majority Negro schools, 23.3 percent of the total Negro enrollment attend majority white schools. This would appear to be a rather segregated situation.

The Camden, N.J., school district has a total enrollment of 20,236 in 31 schools, of which 11,909, or 58.9 percent are Negro students; 6,420, or 31.7 percent are white; and 1,907, or 9.4 percent come from other minority groups. Two schools with a total enrollment 835 have a total minority group enrollment—765 Negroes, 69 Spanish Americans, and one American Indian. There are another seven schools with a total enrollment of 4,300, of which 3,765 are Negroes, 427 are Spanish Americans, 98 are white students—1.5 percent of the total white student enrollment in Camden—and 10 are Oriental students. These seven schools are made up of 95.3 to 98.5 percent minority enrollment. There are another five schools in the 90–95-percent minority enrollment bracket, which have a total enrollment of 3,831 students, of which 2,806 are Negroes, 750 are Spanish Americans, 269—4.2 percent of total white enrollment—are white, four are Orientals, and two are American Indians. There are eight additional majority Negro schools with a total enrollment of 4,784, 3,575 of which are Negroes, 848 are white—3.2 percent of total white enrollment—359 are Spanish Americans, and two are Orientals in these eight schools.

In total there are 22 Negro majority schools with a total enrollment of 13,750, and 1,215 white students—18.9 percent of total white student enrollment—attend these Negro schools in Camden.

There are nine majority white schools with a total enrollment of 6,486, of which 5,205 are white, 998 are Negroes, 274 are listed as Spanish Americans, and nine are from other minority groups.

Overall, 8.3 percent of the Negro students in Camden attend majority white schools and 91.7 percent attend majority Negro schools. 81.1 percent of the total white students attend schools that are majority white and 18.9 percent attend schools where the minority groups are in the majority.

Newark, N.J., is the largest city in the State. It has a total school enrollment of 75,960 in 80 schools, of which 55,057—or 72.5 percent—are Negro students, 13,716—or 18.1 percent—are white, and 7,187—or 9.4 percent—are made up of other minorities, classified by HEW as Spanish Americans, Orientals, and American Indians.

There are 10 schools with a total enrollment of 10,963, which are 100 percent minority segregated—10,607 Negro students and 356 Spanish American. There are 13 schools with a total enrollment of 21,360 that are 99 to 99.9 percent minority segregated. These 13 schools are made up of 20,577 Negro students, 682 Spanish Americans, 94 whites—0.6 percent of total white enrollment—and seven other minority group students. Accordingly, 31,184, or 56.6 percent of the total Negro enrollment are in 23 schools which are 99 percent and 100 percent segregated. There are an additional 15 schools with a total enrollment of 11,712 which are 95.9 to 98.9 percent minority enrollment. There are 10,262 Negro students and 363 white students—2.6 percent of the total white student enrollment—in these schools. It follows that 41,446, or 75.2 percent of total Negro enrollment are in 38 schools that are 95.9 to 100 percent segregated. There are six schools with an aggregate enrollment of 7,194 which are 91.4 to 94.9 percent segregated, there being 5,385 Negro students and 504 white students—3.6 percent of total white student enrollment—with the balance being made up of other minority group students. There are six schools with a total enrollment of 2,410 in the 80- to 90-percent segregated bracket. There are 361 white students in these six schools, 1,555 Negro students, and 487 Spanish Americans. There is a total enrollment of 12,189 students in the remaining 15 majority Negro schools, ranging between 50.2 percent and 79.2 percent minority enrollment.

In all, 53,583, or 97.3 percent of the total Negro student enrollment are in 65 majority Negro schools.

There are 10 majority white schools with a total enrollment of 9,832, of which 8,111 are white, 1,174 are Negro, 516 are Spanish American, and 31 are Orientals. On the basis of these IBM figures, 2.1 percent of the total Negro student enrollment go to majority white schools and 97.3 percent attend majority Negro schools; 59.1 percent of the total white student enrollment attend majority white schools which are 94.1 percent to 65 percent white.

Trenton, the capital of New Jersey, has a total school enrollment of 16,865, of which 11,143, or 66.1 percent are Negro, 4,881, or 28.9 percent, are white, and 5 percent are made up of other minority groups.

In the Negro majority schools there are two schools with a total enrollment of 1,320 that are 99.5 percent and 98.2 percent minority segregated; three schools with a total enrollment of 2,341 that are 95.2 to 97.5 percent minority segregated; seven schools with a total enrollment of 4,442 that are from 80.3 to 94.9 percent minority segregated; and four schools with a total enrollment of 6,492 that are from 52 to 73.1 percent minority segregated.

In the majority white schools, there are five schools with a total enrollment of 2,270, of which 1,789 are white, 357 are Negro, 122 are Spanish American, and two are from other minority groups. The 357 Negro students attending majority white schools represent 3.2 percent of the total Negro enrollment, and the 1,789 white students attending majority white schools represent 36.7 percent of the total white enrollment, with the balance attending majority black schools.

In New Jersey there are a number of smaller cities or towns which have a predominantly white population but have one or two schools that are 90- to 100-percent Negro. For example, the school district of the township of Union, N.J., has a total public school student population of 8,719, of which 7,718 or 88.5 percent are white and 986 or 11.3 percent are Negro students, yet there is one public school of 390 students which is 94.9-percent Negro. It is my understanding that this is the only school district in New Jersey in which the Department of HEW has conducted a thorough survey and negotiated desegregation, and I think this may demonstrate the timidity with which HEW has approached the business of desegregating schools in the North. It is my further understanding that there were indications of gerrymandering in this district but the HEW, after over a year's investigation and negotiation, gave the school district permission to desegregate in two steps over a 2-year period.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD information relative to New Jersey.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Leonard, one of his secretaries, and he announced that on November 26, 1969, the President had approved and signed the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 121) to authorize appropriations for expenses of the National Council on Indian Opportunity.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 118) to grant the consent of the Congress to the Tahoe regional planning compact, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior and others to cooperate with the planning agency thereby created, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 2751. An act to amend section 715 of title 32, United States Code, to authorize the application of local law in determining the effect of contributory negligence on claims involving members of the National Guard;

H.R. 3813. An act to amend section 1331(c) of title 10, United States Code, to authorize the granting of retired pay to persons otherwise qualified who were Reserves before August 16, 1945, and who served on active duty during the so-called Berlin crisis;

H.R. 4248. An act to amend title 5, United States Code, to authorize civilians employed by the Department of Defense to administer oaths while conducting official investigations;

H.R. 4302. An act to amend title 28 of the United States Code, section 753, to authorize payment by the United States of fees charged by court reporters for furnishing certain transcripts in proceedings under the Criminal Justice Act;

H.R. 5278. An act to amend the act of July 24, 1956, to authorize the Secretary of the Army to contract with the Benbrook Water and Sewer Authority for the use of water supply storage in the Benbrook Reservoir;

H.R. 6006. An act to amend section 710(f) of title 32, United States Code, to permit certain commissioned officers of the Army or Air Force, or National Guard, to act as inspecting officers;

H.R. 6265. An act to provide that a headstone or marker be furnished at Government expense for the unmarked grave of any Medal of Honor recipient;

H.R. 8019. An act to amend title 37, United States Code, to provide for the payment of uniform allowances to certain persons originally appointed, temporarily or permanently, as commissioned or warrant officers in a Regular component of the Armed Forces;

H.R. 9052. An act to amend section 716 of title 10, United States Code, to authorize the interservice transfers of officers of the Coast Guard;

H.R. 9485. An act to remove the $10,000 limit on deposits under section 1035 of title 10, United States Code, in the case of any member of a uniformed service who is a prisoner of war, missing in action, or in a detained status during the Vietnam conflict;

H.R. 9486. An act to amend title 37 of the United States Code to provide that a family separation allowance shall be paid to any member of a uniformed service who is a prisoner of war, missing in action, or in a detained status during the Vietnam conflict;

H.R. 9677. An act to amend section 1866 of title 28, United States Code, prescribing the manner in which summonses for jury duty may be served;

H.R. 11265. An act to provide for crediting service as an aviation midshipman for purposes of retirement for nonregular service under chapter 67 of title 10, United States Code, and for pay purposes under title 37, United States Code;

H.R. 12785. An act to declare that the United States holds in trust for the Southern Ute Tribe approximately 214.37 acres of land;

H.R. 12941. An act to authorize the release of 4,180,000 pounds of cadmium from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 13756. An act to amend titles 10, 32, and 37, United States Code, with respect to accountability and responsibility for U.S. property, and for other purposes;

H.R. 14118. An act to amend section 213 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes;

H.R. 14485. An act to amend sections 501 and 504 of title 18, United States Code, so as to strengthen the law relating to the counterfeiting of postage meter stamps or other improper uses of the metered mail system;

H.R. 14517. An act to provide temporary authority to expedite procedures for consideration and approval of projects drawing upon more than one Federal assistance program, to simplify requirements for the operation of those projects, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 14571. An act to amend the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement Act of 1964 for Certain Employees, as amended, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (S.J. Res. 143) extending the duration of copyright protection in certain cases.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred, as indicated:

H.R. 2751. An act to amend section 715 of title 32, United States Code, to authorize the application of local law in determining the effect of contributory negligence on claims involving members of the National Guard;

H.R. 14485. An act to amend sections 501 and 504 of title 18, United States Code, so as to strengthen the law relating to the counterfeiting of postage meter stamps or other improper uses of the metered mail system; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

H.R. 14517. An act to provide temporary authority to expedite procedures for consideration and approval of projects drawing upon more than one Federal assistance program, to simplify requirements for the operation of those projects, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Government Operations.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the previous unanimous-consent agreement, the clerk will report the unfinished business.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CAPITOL GUIDE SERVICE—RECONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, last night, after announcing that there would be no more rollcall votes, the Senate adopted an amendment sponsored by the Senator from Montana (Mr. MANSFIELD) and me. I understand that some Senators have complained about that, due to the fact that they did not think any business would be transacted. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the action taken last night on that amendment be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment at this time, but, at the same time, lest there be any misunderstanding in the future, I think Senators who are interested in the pending bill will be well advised to be on the floor, because amendments are going to be brought up, they are going to be voted on, and as long as the Senate is in session we are going to be working on the bill. If Senators who have amendments are not present, we are going to get third reading of the bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I concur fully in the remarks made by the distinguished senior Senator from Delaware, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Finance. It is our business to attend to the people's business, and this bill will have a very important effect on the people's welfare. I would hope that all Members of the Senate would take to heart what the Senator from Delaware has said, and will be present on the floor, or available on short notice, because it is the intention to try to finish this bill as expeditiously as possible. There will be no delay, I want to assure Senators, as far as the joint leadership of the Senate is concerned, and I am sure there will be no delay, either, as far as the Senate as a whole is concerned.

There is a lot of business to attend to. We are going to be in session every day, including Saturday, beginning at 10 o'clock. All Senators have been put on notice to that effect. If they have any engagements, I suggest that they postpone them, cancel them, or obtain a leave of absence, as I intend to, if necessary, late Saturday afternoon in order to go to St. Mary's College in Notre Dame, at South Bend, Ind., where my wife is to receive an honorary degree from her alma mater. I would not want to miss that for anything in the world.

We have the pending bill, a most important measure, before us. We still have six appropriation bills to be considered. Hopefully we will have a narcotics control bill, a pornography control bill, and a crime bill to consider. We should be prepared to face up to our responsibilities by being in attendance in this Chamber as much as possible, so that we can expedite the business of the people as a whole.

The joint leadership is not fooling when it says we will likely be in session up to December 23. If need be, we will come back the day after Christmas and stay until the New Year to try to take care of the Senate's business. I do not know how much plainer we can make it, but we have a heavy schedule backing up, and it behooves us to face up to our responsibilities and do what the people pay us to do, which is to attend to business.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I thank the Senator.

To make the record clear, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) has offered the pending amendment. I understand, in order to accommodate some Members on our side of the aisle as well as on the other side of the aisle, since we could not get a time limitation, there is more or less a gentlemen's agreement that we will vote on the amendment around 4 or 4:30 this afternoon. In the meantime, if the debate lags, rather than talk needlessly, with the consent of the Senator from Tennessee we may lay that amendment aside, which is normally done, and consider some less controversial amendments, act on them, and then go back to the consideration of that amendment.

I think Senators should be on notice that the business before the Senate is the tax bill, and if we are going to proceed with it as expeditiously as possible, Senators who are interested in what happens here should be on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the will of the Senate?

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the pending amendment would raise the personal exemption for each taxpayer and dependent from $600 under the present law to $1,000 by 1973, proceeding in seriatim increases by $100 per year. That is, the pending amendment would raise the $600 personal exemption of present law to $700 next year, to $800 the year there following, to $900 the year there following, and to $1,000 for the year 1973 and thereafter.

This, Mr. President, is offered as a substitute for the rate changes on personal income contained in the bill, with the single exception that my amendment adopts the change unanimously agreed to in the committee with regard to unmarried taxpayers.

This amendment offers a fundamental choice to the Senate—a choice between types of tax reductions. It may well be that the bill should contain no tax reductions, and I think I might prefer no tax reductions to the type proposed in the committee bill. But that is not the question posed by the pending amendment. The pending amendment poses a choice between two types of tax reduction—between tax reduction by a decrease in tax rates, on the one hand, and tax reduction by means of raising the personal exemption for each taxpayer and dependent on the other.

Therefore, Mr. President, the amendment is simple. It is easily understood. Every mother in America—or at least, in my view, almost every mother in America—understands the personal exemption.

The personal exemption in our tax laws is not new. Indeed, it is as old as the present income tax law itself. After the adoption of the 16th amendment, which was brought about under the leadership of my distinguished former fellow townsman, then Representative, Cordell Hull, Congress enacted, in 1913, the first modern U.S. income tax. That first modern income tax law embraced the theory of a personal exemption. The personal exemption was then $3,000 for a single taxpayer and $4,000 for a married couple.

The exemption has been changed from time to time. In 1940, the personal exemption for a man and wife was $2,000.

During World War II, when too many dollars were chasing scarce commodities, Congress lowered the personal exemption for each taxpayer and dependent to $500, primarily for the purpose of reducing purchasing power because there were simply not enough goods to go around. There it remained until 1948, when it was increased to $600. There it remains in the law today—at $600—and there it is proposed by the administration and the committee bill to leave it: at $600, $50 per month.

What is the theory of the personal exemption, Mr. President? It is that a taxpayer should be permitted sufficient income for himself and his dependents upon which to live at a minimum level of decency before the Federal income tax begins to take a bite of his income. I think this is a sound theory. I do not hear any Senator denying that it is a sound theory. I believe it is socially sound. I believe it is fiscally sound. I am sure it is politically sound.

So, the question is with me the proper amount of the exemption. I must acknowledge that a few people of antediluvian turn of mind do in fact question the whole point of a personal exemption from the heavy hand of Federal income taxes.

I have even heard some individuals or read of some individuals suggesting that the theory is phony. But, we shall not waste time upon that.

I believe the Senate accepts the theory of a personal exemption. Even the administration recommends continuing the present $600 level, although in the letter of Assistant Secretary Cohen, inserted in the RECORD yesterday by the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana, the able chairman of the committee, there is some questioning of the theory, though not a frontal attack. So, unless there is argument about the justification of a personal exemption at some level, I shall not discuss it. However, if someone wishes to debate that matter, I would be happy to engage him. Since I have heard no Senator raise that question, however, I proceed to the adequacy of the personal exemption—a reasonable level of personal exemption.

What is reasonable? What is fair? Mr. President, our Federal Government has engaged in a number of studies to give us some guideposts. The Department of Labor has over a period of years conducted a study to determine the amount of income needed for a "moderate standard of living" for families of different sizes. And what is the definition the Federal Government uses for a "moderate standard of living?" It is one that "provides for the maintenance of health and social well-being, the nurture of children, and participation in community activities."

Is that a fair definition? Does the Senate wish to deny American families a sufficient income for the maintenance of health and social well-being, for the nurture of children? Does the Senate really wish to levy the heavy hand of an income tax on income below this level and this participation in community activities?

I doubt if the Senate wishes to do that. And what amount does the Federal Government after years of study estimate would be an income necessary to maintain a "moderate standard of living?"

I do not have the 1969 figure. It may be available before the debate is concluded. I do have the estimate for 1968. It is $9,484. That supplemented a 1966 estimate of $9,191.

Mr. President, the cost of living has increased more rapidly this year than at any time during the last decade. So one can assume that the estimate of an income necessary for a family of four to maintain a moderate standard of living in October 1968 being $9,484, that estimate of necessity would be approaching $10,000 in December 1969.

I do have a more recent estimate by the Federal Government with respect to the poverty level. Surely the Senate does not want to start levying taxes upon the income of a family that is in poverty, officially declared, upon the income of a family counting the pennies, the nickels, and the dimes trying to emerge from poverty.

The Nixon administration did accommodate those of us who are urging an increase in the exemption. I am not sure it was done for that purpose. But they did accommodate us and accommodate the American people with a release of information on last Sunday. Based upon the increased cost of living, the poverty level of a family of four was officially announced last Sunday to be $3,600.

Mr. President, the U.S. Treasury Department seems not to have learned about that. I do not understand how to explain this cacophony of contradiction. But we have one department of the administration recommending relief payments to a family of four with $3,600 income, and another department of the Government submitting yesterday to the Senate a letter vigorously attacking the pending amendment that would give a family of four next year an exemption from Federal income tax of $3,800. Meanwhile, the cost of living continues to rise.

The Senate is offered a choice, a choice which is meaningful to millions of American families, particularly those with children to feed, cloth, and educate.

I am not here primarily to discuss economic theory, though I would, with some trepidation, venture into such a colloquy if someone wishes to challenge my amendment on such a basis. I am talking about the cost of living. I am talking about bread and meat, clothing and shelter, the opportunity for the little girl to take a music lesson once a week, the opportunity for people to live above the poverty level without Federal taxation, and the opportunity of American families to have a moderate standard of living without an undue tax burden.

Mr. President, it is this group of American families, seeking to nurture their children, seeking to have a part in community activities, seeking to have a moderate, decent standard of living, who are pressured from the bottom and the top, who are having difficulty making ends meet. It is for them I speak.

I ask now, as I asked the Senate last week: Who can live on $50 a month? Who can support a wife on $50 a month? Who can provide for the nurture of children for $50 a month? This is the question that goes to the adequacy of the personal exemption.

Though I did not vote for it, the Senate raised the salary of Senators to $42,500 a year, and during the course of the debate I heard a number of Senators state with what great difficulty they were getting along on $30,000 a year. Perhaps they know, then, what one can do with $50 a month. Perhaps they know that a $600 personal exemption is not adequate for one either to escape the poverty level or to achieve a moderate standard of living. And what is the definition of that, by our own National Government? A moderate standard of living is one that "provides for the maintenance of health and social well-being, the nurture of children, and participation in community activities."

Mr. President, I wish to attack the form of tax relief that the administration proposes, acknowledging that there is some economic question about tax reduction. But I deny that there is justification for the kind of tax reduction proposed in the pending bill, and I refer particularly to the rate changes. What are the rate changes? The bottom rate, which under present law is 14 percent, is changed to 13 percent. That is the provision of the pending bill. A one percentage point reduction in tax rates at the low-income level.

What would that mean, Mr. President? To a man who has a tax liability of $500, this means a $5 per year reduction in his taxes. How can he, with $5 a year, even buy ice cream for the children, let alone provide for the maintenance of health and social well-being, the nurture of children, and participation in community activities?

Let us take the next rate. The next rate is changed from 15 percent to 14 percent—again, a one percentage point change in the rates on the small amounts.

Perhaps I am talking in figures that some of my colleagues will think are too small. Let us take the man who owes $1,000 in tax liability. This would give him a tax reduction of $10. Oh, we are getting somewhere now! For $10 the children might go to a movie now and then; or, if they are trying to escape poverty, they might buy a few more chicken necks to make soup. Perhaps this sounds a little stark. But go to the grocery store and keep your eyes open and see what the families with small incomes are buying. They do not buy steak and roasts. They buy scraps, necks, and feet, and wings now and then.

But perhaps this kind of talk is out of place in the Senate. I am sure it will be out of place in the United States Treasury, from the letter that Assistant Secretary Cohen submitted to the Senate yesterday. There is a disturbing assumption in that letter, which Senators will find printed in the RECORD—an assumption that underlies the Treasury assertion that fiscal responsibility requires that this bill, a tax reform and tax relief bill, not the budget, be a balanced revenue package.

That assumption is that providing decent housing, education, food, and clothing is so low on our scale of social values that if these necessities of life cannot be provided out of tax reform revenues, then our Government cannot afford to provide them for general tax revenues.

The Treasury again entertains that an SST is more important than a child's education, that an ABM has a higher social priority than a decent home, than clothing, and that a healthy diet for a child ranks below oil wells, railroad boxcars, and bankers' profits on our scale of national social values.

Yes, Mr. President, I am going to challenge with every ounce of vigor I can muster the assumptions and the basic theses of justification, of priorities, in our system contained in the Treasury letter.

All of these items to which I have referred are, by the assumptions of Secretary Cohen's letter, given a higher claim on the tax revenues of the U.S. Government. But if someone comes along and speaks for the fathers and mothers, the wage earners who are trying to buy or build a house and raise their children with a moderate standard of living, providing for their health and social well-being, then we have to produce a balanced revenue bill or else face the charge of fiscal irresponsibility.

I did not hear the Treasury claiming fiscal irresponsibility with respect to the new loopholes proposed in the bill. Indeed, the Treasury was proposing many of them. I did not hear the Treasury worrying about spending too much money when we considered the deployment of an ABM system. These projects now have first call ahead of the needs of food, clothing, and shelter for every taxpayer, his wife, and children.

It is certainly true that tax expenditures through deductions and exemptions are as much fiscal expenditures of the Government as though Congress appropriated the funds. I stand ready to affirm that belief by making decent provision for the necessities of life for the men, women, and children of our Nation through an increase in personal exemptions and this has a higher personal priority and it should make a sterner demand on our consciences than all the railroad boxcars, the SST's and, yes, even the superhighways that we are building.

I charge that the Treasury is guilty of fiscal myopia. The rule of fiscal irresponsibility rests in assuring our people, all the people, of a fair tax-free allowance for the necessities of life. My amendment passes that test; the bill and Treasury recommendation does not. The Treasury officials have consistently opposed my proposal to increase the personal exemption on the primary ground that it is not possible to raise a personal exemption to $1,000 due to fiscal needs. Thus, they assert that a $1,000 personal exemption would produce a long-term revenue shortfall within the bill, within the tax bill, within the tax reform and tax relief bill, of $8.1 billion.

Mr. President, the outgo and income of the U.S. Treasury are affected by other things. Where is the drive for economy? As I walked across to the Capitol from the Senate Office Building I observed seven men planting one little tree on the Capitol grounds. Maybe that is too small an item to refer to in this debate that affects billions of dollars and millions of people, but it is symbolic. Where were the Treasury officials, and my colleagues who are concerned with fiscal responsibility, when we voted on the amendment to cut the space program by a mere $100 million?

There are other places we can economize to greater advantage with less hurt to our society than to deny a fair personal exemption for the cost of supporting a wife, providing a house, providing food, providing clothing, and providing education for the children. To what would we attach a higher priority? I would have difficulty finding a higher priority myself, but by the letter of Secretary Cohen this is the place to economize.

Again I ask, and I shall continue to ask throughout the day: Who can live on $50 a month? Is there any Senator here who wishes to say he or one of his constitutents could maintain a decent standard of living on $50 a month? Who can support a wife for $50 a month? I know colleagues may tire of hearing me ask the question.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GORE. I yield. I hope I am not irritating my colleague.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Senator is not irritating me; I am in agreement with the argument the Senator makes. I would like to address a number of inquiries to the Senator from Tennessee. When the Senator talks about living on $50 a month, is it not true that the $600 exemption was established in 1948?

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The purchasing power of today's dollar as I understand from the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, is such that a taxpayer today would have to have $929 to have the equivalent of $600 in 1948. Is that correct.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct, except that that estimate was arrived at in October and the figure has increased since October.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Let us say that even if it were $929, that is a great deal of difference, if we talk about a minimum exemption to permit an individual to keep body and soul together. Certainly, to try to stay with the $600 exemption at the present time would be grossly unfair; is that not correct?

Mr. GORE. That is correct. This is the estimate supplied by an agency of the Government.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. GORE. Once again, may I say, we have the Secretary of the Treasury advancing $600 as an adequate amount; indeed, in the executive session of the committee he said to me that by the statistics of other agencies of the Government, he had become convinced it was not possible to warrant—I have forgotten his exact words—I believe he said that an increase in personal exemption beyond $600 was not warranted. Then, as the Senator will recall, I said that I do not believe any mother in America would agree with him. Yet, while we have the Department of the Treasury insisting that $600 a year is adequate, we have this official estimate of the Bureau of Labor Statistics that $929 is necessary for a minimum of existence in October of this year.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Is it not a fact that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee would remove twice as many people from the taxrolls as the committee amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes, that is correct. I assert that that is one of its strong points.

Mr. RIBICOFF. In other words, what the Senator is trying to do, as I have tried to follow his excellent argument, is to concentrate tax relief provisions in the lowest income brackets instead of the highest income tax brackets.

Mr. GORE. This amendment and the committee bill provide fairly well for those at the poverty level insofar as taxation is concerned, but it is the group with an income of $5,000 to $15,000 that is so harshly pressed and for whom my amendment would maximize relief.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I think that could be highlighted. The committee bill gives more dollars in tax relief to the 95,000 taxpayers who earn more than $100,000 a year than to the 30 million taxpayers who earn less than $7,000 a year; is that not correct?

Mr. GORE. Yes, through rate reductions.

Mr. RIBICOFF. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. Incidentally, if my calculations are correct—I do not find them just now, but if we desired—would the Senator repeat the statement he just made?

Mr. RIBICOFF. The committee bill gives more dollars in tax relief to the 95,000 taxpayers who earn more than $100,000 a year than to the 30 million taxpayers who earn less than $7,000 a year.

Mr. GORE. Last night, as I was studying this proposition, I made a little calculation. If we divide the $641 million of tax reduction provided by the bill, by the 95,000 who would receive it, we find an average tax reduction for that group, with $100,000 and more of taxable income, of $6,756 each.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Take another——

Mr. GORE. May I just go one step further?

Mr. RIBICOFF. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I also divided the 30 million taxpayers with incomes under $7,000 into the same amount—divided the same dollar amount by these 30 million taxpayers, and I find an average tax reduction for that lower income group of $20.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Nine out of 10 Americans make less than $15,000 a year. The committee bill would give these taxpayers only two-thirds of the tax relief. The Gore proposal would give the nine-tenths of all taxpayers, who earn less than $15,000 a year, 80 percent of tax relief; is that not correct?

Mr. GORE. Correct.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Thus, basically, what the Senator from Tennessee is trying to do is to give the most relief in dollars to the greatest number of American taxpayers.

Mr. GORE. With particular emphasis on those with the most dependents to support.

Mr. RIBICOFF. That is correct. One thing further that I think should be highlighted in the work of the Senator from Tennessee is a pertinent set of figures. As I understand the Gore proposal, a family of four would be permitted to retain $5,000 tax free when the Senator's amendment becomes fully effective in 1973.

Mr. GORE. Correct.

Mr. RIBICOFF. And this family, if its total earnings were, say, $7,500, would have its Federal income taxes reduced by almost one-half, whereas the committee bill would reduce them only by 7 percent.

Mr. GORE. Correct.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Thus, the concern of the Senator from Tennessee is basically with the majority of taxpayers and families in the United States.

Mr. GORE. That is correct. Again, let me say, with particular reference to those families with children, who desire to provide for the maintenance of health and social well-being for their families, the nurture of the children, and to participate in community activities.

Mr. RIBICOFF. That is what we are really trying to do, to build up our country instead of watching it disintegrate—with its families disintegrating the way they have been.

Mr. GORE. I am not sure whether the Senator was present when I cited the estimate of the Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, of the amount necessary for a family of four to maintain a moderate standard of living. It was $9,484 in 1968. I do not have the estimate yet for 1969.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I have followed with great interest the criticism that the Senator from Tennessee is undergoing by many of those who have always held the Senator in high regard. It is rather amusing to watch them praise the Senator from Tennessee and then talk about the dastardly deeds he is seeking to accomplish through his amendment.

I believe they fail to understand what the Senator from Tennessee is really driving at. It is true that in the Senator's proposal, like the entire proposal, we are reordering the priorities in this country. I had hoped that the administration would have taken the lead in trying to show what this country actually needs in the way of priorities. But it has failed to do that. It has failed to take on this fight.

But the House and Senate, in the tax bill, have not come up with a bill that is only tax reform. A tax relief bill as well as tax reform bill has been brought to the floor of the Senate. Taking the tax relief bill as a basis of what the Senate is really acting upon, what the Senator from Tennessee is actually doing is examining most carefully the tax relief proposals of the pending bill and saying to the American people, "Let us see where the basic needs are. Let us see where the relief is needed. Let us come up with a proposal that will do the most for the people that need it the most in the United States." The Senator from Tennessee is being criticized when I think the Senator from Tennessee should be commended for the job he is doing to highlight his proposal.

I am honored, and I consider it a privilege, to cosponsor the Senator's amendment. I hope the Senator's amendment will prevail when we vote on it this afternoon.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am grateful, indeed, to my able and distinguished colleague. As Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in a previous administration, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut is as well—I dare say more adequately—informed and equipped as any other Member of this body to measure and consider the standards and the needs of a decent social existence in our country.

I would like to inquire of him if he concurs in the estimate of the Bureau of Labor Statistics that somewhere near the $10,000 income level is necessary for a family of four to enjoy a moderate standard of living in this affluent society of ours.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I do not think there is any question about that. I certainly agree.

I think what the Senator is doing has even greater relevance to some of the problems that we have in America that I do not see anyone addressing himself to. Much is needed in this country for the lower income groups, the people under the poverty line. We are not going to be able to solve those problems unless we take into account the problems of the lower-middle income groups, because that is where the problems are. The lower income groups, including blacks reaching for a greater part of American affluence, all finding themselves in conflict with another part of our society. Whether one calls it the silent majority, the blue collar class, the white collar class, or the lower middle-income groups, unless we recognize the problems of this group in trying to keep body and soul together, to maintain their respectability, and to educate their children, we are going to find continued resistance in American society in trying to enact legislation to provide funds to lift up from the doldrums of our society those in poverty and those whose skins are black.

We make a great mistake in paying very little attention to the lower middle-income groups. Our society is rich enough and affluent enough to make sure that we solve the problems of the lower income groups, but, at the same time, we must remove the great conflicts that exist now, all over this country, between the lower income groups and the lower middle-income groups, who feel that no one gives a damn, so to speak, as to where they are going and what their problems are.

What the Senator from Tennessee is doing is a matter of great statesmanship, because in his amendment he recognizes that unless we ameliorate the problems of the lower middle-income groups—the $7,000, $8,000, $9,000, $10,000, $12,000, $15,000 group in our society, who represent nine-tenths of the American people—we are going to be hard pressed and hard put to put into effect the great reforms, social and economic, that this country needs.

Therefore, we must pay great attention to the Senator's proposal, because one of the few ways in which we can help solve the problems of the lower middle-income groups is by removing one of their greatest burdens—the disproportionate share that they pay by way of taxes for the running of our Government. Once we can solve that pressing problem, it is my opinion we can start moving in to take care of some of the problems of the lower income groups, which we in the Senate, in the House, and in the executive branch, have an obligation to achieve and accomplish.

Mr. GORE. I thank my distinguished colleague for that eloquent statement. I concur in the sentiments he has expressed.

I wish to make further reference to his adversion to the disproportionate burden of taxation that falls upon the middle-income group. The changes in tax rate contained in the pending bill would make that burden worse instead of better. The top bracket rates were reduced drastically in 1964—far too much in my opinion at that time, and I still hold that opinion. The top rate was reduced from 91 percent to 70 percent—21 percentage points. And now the top rate is proposed to be reduced to 65 percent.

But that does not tell the whole story. By changing the brackets as well as the rates, the tax cut on some of the high-bracket incomes will be as much as 8 percentage points. If the bill should be adopted, I say to my distinguished colleague from Connecticut, then progressivity, the principle of graduation, the principle that people should pay taxes according to their ability to pay, that the more one earns, the more he pays, will all but be abolished beyond the income level of $50,000.

It is astounding to me that a Democratic Congress would consider, in a 5-year time bracket, the destruction of progressivity in our income taxes beyond the $50,000 level.

Oh, there is a place where the progressivity is very steep—very steep—as provided by the bill. From a taxable income level of $500 to $10,000, the progressivity is 100 percent. That is, the rate changes in the bill provide that from the rate of taxation on $500 of taxable income to $10,000 of taxable income, the rates are doubled—a 100-percent increase in rates.

Let us take another level. From the level of the tax rates on $100,000 of taxable income to $200,000 of taxable income, the rate increase is how much? Not up there at 100 percent. The increase is only 5 percent.

How does a Senator justify, or could anybody justify, in the name of progressivity, in the name of graduation in our income tax law, a progression of 100 percent on $9,500 in income, and 5 percent on an additional $100,000 income—that is, additional after one has attained the first $100,000?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I would say the Senator is absolutely right, and his amendment tends to bring a sense of sanity and an overdue sense of fairness to our tax laws. The proposal of the Senator from Tennessee certainly deserves the overwhelming support of this body.

Mr. President, we have the opportunity to reduce significantly the tax burden on the most overtaxed segment of our society—those in the middle- and low-income brackets.

Fairness alone dictates tax relief for those millions of Americans.

Last year the average citizen paid $163 in local taxes, $198 to his State government and then had to turn over $741 to the Federal Government.

The most effective tax relief we can provide is to increase the personal exemption and raise the minimum standard deduction. These reductions will remove the largest number of low-income taxpayers from the tax roles entirely and substantially reduce the overall tax on those most in need of this reduction.

The personal exemption now allowed each taxpayer is $600. This figure was set in 1948.

Despite a steady increase for the last 20 years in the price of goods and services, the personal exemption has remained the same.

Mr. President, the personal exemption is founded on the theory that every man is entitled to a tax-free sum of money to meet his most basic living expenses.

No one can possibly exist on $600 at today's prices.

In 1948 a loaf of bread cost 14 cents; a half a gallon of milk cost 43 cents. These are the prices of a bygone era, the last remaining vestige of which is the $600 exemption.

To equal the purchasing power of $600 in October, 1948, the personal exemption today would have to be $929. Thus a family of four would need exemptions of $3,716 to equal the $2,400 they received in 1948.

Mr. President, I support the amendment to the pending tax reform legislation increasing the personal exemption and the minimum standard deduction.

Under the bill reported by the Finance Committee, the 11 percent of Americans who earn over $15,000 receive one-third of the tax relief. This is unfair.

The amendment proposed by Senator GORE, which I am cosponsoring, would increase the tax relief afforded to the 9 out of 10 Americans who make less than $15,000. The Finance Committee bill would afford these people 66 percent of the relief. The Gore amendment would increase this to 81 percent.

Additionally, the Gore proposal would completely remove substantially more of the low-income poor from the tax rolls.

Under the Gore proposal, when it becomes fully effective, a family of four will be permitted to retain $5,000 tax free.

The taxes of this family if it earned $7,500 would be reduced by 47 percent under this proposal as compared to a reduction of less than 7 percent under the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

I believe the proposal before this Senate is a sensible and responsible means to enact tax fairness. I urge its adoption.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. This colloquy punctuates the assertion I made earlier that even though we were unable to raise the personal exemption, I would still oppose the tax relief as proposed by the rate changes in the bill. It is regressive. It makes the tax burden disproportionately worse instead of better.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator tell us what the amount of the exemption is to be increased to ultimately?

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator mean by my amendment?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GORE. The personal exemption would reach the level of $1,000 for each taxpayer and dependent in the year 1973, progressing by $100 per year.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator knows that I have a deep concern over this progressivity, and I am sure he and I share a concern about regressive taxation. It is for that reason that I am troubled over the increase in the personal exemption from $600 to $1,000, because I can visualize it working out most inequitably.

A wealthy taxpayer, in a 70-percent income tax bracket, with a $1,000 personal exemption, would have a $700 tax benefit under the Senator's amendment; and a taxpayer down in the 20-percent bracket, a low-income taxpayer, would end up with only a $200 tax benefit. That seems to me to be an approach which is along the lines of letting the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. How does the Senator answer that problem?

Mr. GORE. Well, if we were considering an increase in the personal exemption or the provision of a tax credit for each dependent, without either being offered as a substitute for provisions in the bill that provide far greater relief for those in the upper-income brackets, then the answer would be of one order. But that is not the case. If the Senator asks me to compare a tax credit for each taxpayer and dependent with a personal exemption for each taxpayer and dependent, then I would say, as a tax purist, that we would need to consider it on its merits—and it does have merits, which I do not deny and do not wish to deny.

But if we concluded that a tax credit was the proper way to provide this tax relief for dependents, or for each taxpayer and each dependent, instead of a personal exemption, then it would seem that we should repeal the $600 exemption. And one can make a case for that.

Actually, a tax credit is, perhaps, from the standpoint of tax purists, more justifiable. But we do not operate in a vacuum. We begin from where we are. There is no provision in the tax law, in my opinion, that is more widely understood by the American people than the personal exemption. As I said earlier, before the able Senator entered the Chamber, this principle was incorporated in the first modern income tax law in 1913. It is a part of our economic and tax law fabric. The simplest way, I think the most widely accepted way, certainly the most widely understood way to provide tax relief for those with the largest families, is to increase that personal exemption.

If that be the case, then I come to this further facet of the question of the able Senator: Does it provide more relief for those with high incomes than for those with low incomes? This depends upon whether you consider an exemption provided at the bottom of one's income, before Federal taxation begins to apply, or whether you consider it as a reduction from the top income. Mathematically, it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GORE. Just one moment. Mathematically it amounts to the same thing. It means that a $100 added exemption for a taxpayer in the 20-percent bracket means less than a $100 added exemption for a taxpayer in the 50-percent bracket.

I think, however, that we must never lose sight of the fact that what I am offering here is substitution for tax rate changes which provide many times more tax relief for those in the upper brackets than my amendment would provide.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GORE. Now I yield.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator has just made a very important point, when he refers to other things in his amendment which are going to provide overall relief. I think the Senator will appreciate the fact that the average taxpayer is not too concerned about what you call this deduction or what you call that item; what he is really concerned about is how much that tax bill that he is going to have to pay amounts to. The Senator quite correctly interprets that attitude of the average taxpayer when he alludes to other rate changes that he is providing in his amendment, which are going to cause the taxpayers to pay less in taxes, certainly in the lower and low-middle income areas—areas I might say, toward which I am just as much interested in doing equity as is the Senator from Tennessee.

So I do not think we should be too concerned about the fact that this personal exemption has been hanging around on the income tax laws for a good many years. After all, this is supposed to be a tax reform bill; and if the personal exemption is out of date, if by increasing it we are going to be doing inequity by giving high-bracket taxpayers a better tax break than low-bracket taxpayers, maybe we ought to reform it and get rid of it.

The Senator points out that this tax credit—which is no original idea of mine; it has been on our statute books, in the case of the Iowa income tax law, for years—is a very fair way of handling this matter; and if a taxpayer ends up paying less tax because he has a tax credit of $150, for example, to take off his tax bill for himself and his wife and each of his children, it would seem to me that that, coupled with some rate changes, would really do a job of tax reform.

The Senator knows that in the committee we got fairly close together one morning in trying to come up with a better way of doing equity; certainly, to looking at the children as being proper objects of uniform treatment under tax law. To me a child, whether that child comes from a poor family or a wealthy family, ought to have the same status in the eyes of our income tax law.

I think it is wrong when a child who comes from a wealthy family represents in the eyes of the tax law a tax benefit for his parents amounting to $700, 70 percent of $1,000, and a child of a poor or low-income family that is in the 20-percent bracket only receives $200 recognition under the tax law.

Maybe this has been sticking around for a long time in the tax law. However, if we are really to accomplish some tax reform, this is a good way to get rid of the inequity once and for all.

I am in great sympathy with many things that the Senator is trying to do. I wish there were some way we could possibly modify the amendment, at least as far as children are concerned, to include a tax credit. I am sure that it could be worked out so that the tax bill the taxpayer would have to pay would be no greater, and perhaps less, for most people.

As I recall when we had a comparison by the Treasury Department, the difference in the impact between a $780 personal exemption and, I believe, a $180 income tax credit, on the low- and middle-income groups was much more beneficial in the case of tax credit.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator makes an able argument. He presented his case and this argument to the Senate Finance Committee. As the Senator will recall, I voted for each of the amendments the Senator offered in this regard. Unfortunately, the amendments did not receive majority support or a vote very close to a majority. The Senate Committee voted more closely upon an increase in the personal exemption, one vote being a tie vote, 8 to 8.

I think that illustrates the depth to which a personal exemption is imbedded in our tax law, in our social consciousness, and in our political concepts.

To further illustrate that, I know of no one other than the able senior Senator from Iowa, who has introduced a bill to substitute credit for an increase in the exemption. There may be some. I have not heard of them.

I do know that a number of Members of the Senate, several Members on the Senator's side of the aisle, have introduced bills this year to increase the personal exemption.

I refer, for instance, to the able minority leader, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, who has introduced a bill to raise the personal exemption to $1,000.

I refer to my able and distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), who has introduced a bill to increase the personal exemption to $1,200.

And there are also a number of Senators on my side of the aisle. I do not now have particularly in mind all of those on both sides of the aisle who have introduced such bills. However, there are a number of them. That seems to me to further illustrate the extent to which the Senators and the people understand the personal exemption. And to further illustrate the fact, as the Senator may have noticed, I introduced in the RECORD letters of petition to the Senate delivered to me by three Members of the House of Representatives, two Democrats and one Republican, containing the names of far more than one-half of the membership of the other body, petitioning the Senate to increase the personal exemption.

When we add to that the fact that this is understood by the American people, and then consider that one of the goals of tax reform should be simplification and public understanding, I believe that the argument is then overwhelmingly in favor of proceeding with the approach of increasing the personal exemption.

I close my response to the able Senator from Iowa by saying that I recognize how the Senator feels about this.

I applaud his concern for equitable treatment of the family with children to nurture and educate. However, since his tax credit approach does not offer an opportunity of success in my opinion, I earnestly plead with him to join with me, as I joined with him, in providing this relief by the route which I believe has the chance of success.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his response. However, I think it gets down to this. Just because there may be a number of people who advocate an increase in the personal exemption regardless of the fact that it would give a bigger tax break for higher rather than for lower taxpayers and just because one could regard this as emanating from people who favor regressive taxation does not make it fair and does not make it right.

The Senator talks about people understanding this. I repeat that I think what people understand is what their tax bill is. And if their tax bill is going to be less because they are given a better understanding of rates and a tax credit off their tax bill, which would be better than what they are getting now by taking $600 off taxable income, I would think the taxpayer would be delighted, and especially the low-income people.

Possibly some of the higher bracket taxpayers would not like it as well because they would not get as much break with a $150 tax credit as they would with a $600 personal exemption. The $150 tax credit would take $150 off their bill, whereas if they are in the 70-percent bracket, a $600 personal exemption would mean a $420 deduction from the tax bill. So, naturally, some higher bracket taxpayers are not going to be happy with a tax credit. However, that does not mean that we should in turn give them a $700 tax break with a $1,000 exemption, when the people in the low-income bracket, paying 15 or 20 percent, would end up with a crumb from the table.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not accept the argument of the able Senator that an increase in the personal exemption is regressive.

I believe in the principle that has been a part of our tax law since 1913, that a minimum amount of income should be free from tax and that if one accepts this as a fair and socially, politically acceptable principle, then he can hardly deny the rich this stated minimum, the benefit of this principle, any more than he can withhold it and deny it to the poor.

I think it is a fair principle to allow every American citizen, rich or poor, a minimum for existence for himself and his dependents before the Federal income tax begins to lie. That is the principle on which the personal exemption is based.

I do not accept the theory of the Senator that this principle is regressive. I think it is quite sound, and whether or not the taxes are regressive or progressive depends upon the rate schedules applied to the income beyond this level. beyond this minimum level.

I wish to place in the RECORD at this point a table which shows that the pending bill would, in fact, be regressive. Tax rate reductions are small at the bottom, with largest reductions at the level of $50,000 a year and upward. Beyond $50,000, the percentage of tax reduction provided by the committee bill, by the change in the rate schedule, goes up instead of down.

I ask unanimous consent to have the table printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE 1.—COMPARISON OF TAX REDUCTION UNDER PERSONAL EXEMPTION PROPOSAL AND H.R. 13270

[1] Provisions as effective for taxable years beginning in 1973.

(At this point Mr. BYRD of Virginia assumed the chair.)

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I must tell my friend that perhaps in his thinking the word "regressive" means something different from the meaning in the mind of the Senator from Iowa. If we are going to come up with a change in the tax law under the name of tax reform, which is going to mean that a wealthy taxpayer is going to have a $1,000 personal exemption and a $700 tax break as a result of it, because he is in a 70-percent income tax bracket, and a low-income taxpayer with a $1,000 exemption is going to have only a $200 tax break, I think this is pretty regressive; and I think it falls in the same area of criticism as the tax rates to which the Senator from Tennessee is now referring.

If that is not regressive, I do not know what the word means. I repeat that while there may be a number of people who have not thought through the personal exemption and thought through what would happen to wealthy taxpayers and low-income taxpayers by increasing it from $600 to $1,000, that does not mean that the U.S. Senate should go ahead and compound inequity.

I do not know how the Senator's amendment is going to fare, but if it should not be adopted, I would suggest to him that there ought to be a little collaboration here, possibly to improve upon the tax rates and to tie in a tax credit, certainly so far as the children are concerned. If we did that, I think we would be applauded; and it would not take very long, through the mass media and the rapidity of communications, for the American people to know that finally, after many years, we did in fact achieve some tax reform in this very important area of tax law.

I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. GORE. I thank my able friend. He and I, I think, could entertain ourselves with a discussion of the number of spirits on the point of a needle. Particularly, I would enjoy hearing my able friend the senior Senator from Iowa. But I think the principles involved herein have been fairly stated.

My amendment would provide more relief for the people who need it most, the people with most dependents to support, in the lower middle income bracket.

As will be noted, the pending bill provides a tax reduction of $30 for a taxpayer with $5,000 taxable income and a wife and two children. Once again, I ask: What does a $30 tax reduction per year really mean to a man with a wife and two children? That is $7.50 each. The cost of living for four people has increased more than that in the last 30 days. My amendment does not do too well by him, perhaps. It would give him a tax reduction of $230. He cannot do too much with $230, but at least it is $200 more than $30. That is not regressive. That is trying to be fair.

Let us take another. Each of the taxpayers to whom I refer in this table and to whom I will refer in the comments on the table is one with a taxable income of a given amount and three dependents. Take the taxpayer with an income of $7,500. The committee bill, which is called a tax reform and tax relief bill, provides tax relief of $36. That is $3 a month for a family of four. My amendment would give this taxpayer a tax reduction of $262.

Let us go to another. With an income of $10,500, the bill would give him a tax relief of $56; my amendment, $304.

Let us go to $15,000. The committee bill reduces his taxes $96. This is beginning to be meaningful; $96 is $8 a month, $2 each. They can go to a couple of movies for that. My bill, instead, gives him a tax reduction of $352. The two begin to reach equality just above the $50,000 income level. Let us take a taxpayer with $50,000 income. The committee bill would give tax relief of $608.

My amendment would give him tax relief of $720. Beyond that, the committee bill begins to pile up the benefits. The taxpayer with an income of $100,000 receives a tax reduction of $2,256.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I shall yield in just a moment.

For a taxpayer with $500,000 income, the committee bill would give him a tax reduction of $22,656. My amendment would give him a tax reduction of $1,120. Mr. President, mind you, he has no more children under the committee bill than he has under my bill. He still has two children to support and a wife to support.

Now, it may be, as the Senator from Iowa states, that there is some element of unfairness in providing $1,120 tax relief for a man with $500,000 income because he has three dependents while providing only $304 in tax relief for a taxpayer with the same number of dependents and income of $10,000.

One can recognize that, but let us look at the differences in the committee bill and its treatment of those two men. The committee bill provides relief for a taxpayer with $10,000 of $56; and the taxpayer with $500,000 of income, of $22,656. So my amendment would substitute $1,120 tax relief for a provision that provides a tax reduction of $22,656. How anyone would construe that as regressive I am unable to say.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I would like to underscore what the Senator is talking about. Statistically speaking, what the Senator has said is correct. The people having more than $50,000 in income a year, representing less than one-half of 1 percent of the people who file tax returns, receive an undue share of tax relief.

The bill before the Senate provides 13.4 of the tax relief to this group, which represents less than four-tenths of 1 percent of all taxpayers, which demonstrates conclusively that the benefit is going to those who need it least. It is unnecessarily beneficial to the rich; and it is unnecessarily inadequate for the poor.

The ratio of relief between the $20,000 and $50,000 category—the amount of tax relief provided under the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, of which I am a cosponsor—is not as great to those people with incomes of less than $20,000, and the bulk of the American people are in that category of incomes of less than $20,000.

We proceeded with the basic belief that a man in the poverty bracket would not have to pay a tax. I would like to call attention to the fact that the need to increase the personal exemption is not a new idea. The Treasury Department made a study of exemptions in 1947.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator gets to that point, I would like to give another illustration which was brought up by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

The committee bill would provide, by tax rate changes, $641 million of tax reduction for 95,000 taxpayers with incomes of $100,000 and over. Let me repeat—$641 million for 95,000 taxpayers.

Mr. HARTKE. For how many?

Mr. GORE. 95,000. It provides approximately an equal amount of tax reduction of $641 million for 30 million taxpayers with incomes under $7,000.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I think this statement is very important. I hope the Senate understands what is being said. It is a situation with so many facets, one which requires so much understanding, but one thing is clear and that is that some tax relief is needed for the low- and middle-income groups.

I agree with the Senator about what the Senator from Iowa said. There may be some fancy juggling with statistics in regard people with incomes of over $100,000, but that is not where the need is. Those people do not come home and meet the mother and the kids every Friday night with a paycheck and figure out how they are going to cut down on expenses. I might turn to those who are in the poverty group. Those figures are not very extravagant. They do not talk about buying a new car every year. They buy things that people with incomes over $100,000 would never worry about. They might buy a different used car every 4 years.

The point I am talking about is that people in the lower levels, and the poverty level, have a standard that is not very high.

To return to the circumstances we have today, if tax relief is to be given to people in the same proportions as when the $600 exemption was established after World War II, we would have to go not to $1,000, but to more nearly $2,500. We have not kept pace with the times. The needs of individuals have gone up and but the tax relief has gone down.

I hope that someday economists and sociologists apply themselves to what happens to people when the tax laws are changed. This is what the Senator is talking about, and I commend him for it. The Senator is talking about what happens to a man and a woman who have two children, ages 7 and 13. They are in the position where they have to worry about whether they are going to eat hamburger this week or soup. That is the difference.

Mr. GORE. I believe it is illustrated by a simple question: Who can live on $50 a month?

Mr. HARTKE. I think this is elementary. I commend the Senator.

I know that the Senator is quite aware of what I am about to say, but in 1947 the Treasury Department made a study of the entire question of exemptions and they came to certain basic conclusions. This was right after World War II. Before World War II there was a personal exemption of $1,000, then it went to $500 and finally back to $600. I wish to quote one paragraph from the study to which I have referred:

> According to a widely accepted view, the exemption should be at least adequate to cover some minimum essential living costs, such as the amount required for reasonable maintenance. It is conceded that the adjustment of exemptions to living costs may not be exact and that under emergency conditions it may be necessary to go below ordinary minima. For the long run, however, it is to be regarded as essential to exempt amounts required to maintain the individual and his family in health and efficiency.

That is exactly what the Senator from Tennessee is talking about, and what I am talking about, what the committees are talking about, and the great bulk of Americans. The average American has suffered long enough. It is time we recognize that the end of that suffering must come and that we must do something for these people.

I talked to a young man this week in Washington. He said to me, "You people on the Hill had better get busy." I said, "What's the problem?" He said, "I am working three jobs a day in order to keep my family going." I asked him, "How many children do you have?" He said. "Four."

I think that the attitude of people should be reflected in a government that is really concerned about human needs.

Mr. GORE. I want to thank the Senator from Indiana for joining me in sponsorship of the amendment. I have always found him to be a champion in the cause of justice and equity in tax policy and tax law.

With regard to the young gentleman the Senator just mentioned with four children and a wife, working at three jobs in order to maintain them, the Government estimate that I saw as of October last year stated that a family of four would need an income of $9,484 to maintain a moderate standard of living. I do not have the figure for December of 1969. I do not know what it will be in April of 1970. But, surely, it is in the order of $10,000. Yet, for this man, whom the Senator has cited, with a wife and four children, if he is able, by working at three jobs, to earn $10,000, the pending bill would provide him a tax relief of $56. I thought the Senator would be interested in that.

Mr. HARTKE. There is no question about the need for the bill. It is here. Now is the time. It is repetitious to keep talking about it. Frankly, even if we do not increase the personal exemption, there will be cost to the Government. People will be driven to welfare. They must pay their bill. Maybe not as well as they would like to. It sort of depreciates their appreciation of their Government because they feel that somehow or another they are not able to earn their way and therefore they are forced to go to some agency that they would prefer not to use.

I am not one who says that all people on welfare really apply themselves as well as they should, but most apply out of sheer need. It is time to eliminate many people from the taxrolls. The welfare load should be reduced. To a great extent while 50 percent is paid by the Federal Government and the States also, it is true that property taxes are soaring. Look at it on that basis. Probably it would provide not alone an equality or a utilization of the tax money collected but in addition probably would give some relief to people from the tensions they feel from the tremendous squeeze occasioned by the cost of living. The standard of living has increased in this country and, therefore, it is just, equitable, fair, good, and right, that my amendment to increase the personal exemption be adopted.

Mr. GORE. I thank the able Senator. I wish Mr. President, to make particular reference to the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury published in the RECORD on yesterday. The first fallacy of the argument which the Treasury advances is that it assumes failure to produce in this particular bill a relative balance between revenues and tax relief is, ipso facto, a demonstration of fiscal irresponsibility. Nothing could be further from the truth. A judgment as to fiscal responsibility depends on the impact of my proposal on the total budget picture of the Government, upon the total economy of the country, and upon the social fabric and the consequences of the proposal, and not just the amounts in the particular bill.

No one in the Treasury or elsewhere, so far as I am aware, has asserted that an increase in the personal exemption will, in and of itself, produce a budget deficit either in the short run or in the long run. Indeed, quite the contrary is true.

Given reasonable estimates as to future needs of spending and increased tax revenues from growth in the economy, we can expect a unified budget surplus of from $3 billion to $6 billion in the coming fiscal years, even with an increase to a more realistic $1,000 personal exemption.

Mr. President, this estimate is not lightly arrived at. I ask that this subject be given careful consideration, and I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table which verifies this conclusion.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ESTIMATED BUDGET EFFECTS OF GORE PROPOSAL—FISCAL YEARS

	1970	1971	1972	1973	1974
Revenue:
1. Present law (including surcharge for 6 months of 1970 and assumed 6 percent annual increase in revenues)	$197.2	$209.0	$221.5	$234.8	$248.9
2. Tax reform	+1.6	+3.8	+4.7	+5.0	+5.3
Total revenue	198.6	212.8	226.2	239.8	254.2
Increase in personal exemption ($700 in calendar 1970; $800 in 1971; $900 in 1972; $1,000 in 1973)	−1.6	−5.5	−9.4	−13.0	−14.8
Net revenue after increase in personal exemption	197.0	207.3	216.8	226.8	239.4
Expenditures (assumes $10,000,000,000 per year increase)	−192.9	−203.0	−213.0	−223.0	−233.0
Unified budget surplus	+4.1	+4.3	+3.8	+3.8	+6.4

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Treasury Department has not even attempted to assert the contrary. This illustrates that the question of fiscal responsibility partakes of many parts, not merely a narrow measurement between tax reform and tax relief. Indeed, this question goes, as I have said, to our whole society. Further revenues from tax reform have nothing logically to do with a tax measure to increase or reduce the tax burden.

Former Secretary of the Treasury Fowler stated on numerous occasions before congressional committees that the issues of tax reform on the one hand and tax decreases or increases on the other are two quite separate and independent issues. He was correct.

Proper tax reforms should be enacted because they constitute wise, fair, equitable tax policy. Appropriate tax relief should be enacted because it is in the best interests of our people, because of economic justification, and because of revenue needs. But it does not mean at all, Mr. President, that in order to have tax reform, we engage in the sham of tax relief by rate changes of 1 percentage point for the low brackets on small amounts of income and up to 8 percentage points in the high brackets on large amounts.

One could almost reach the conclusion that the rate changes, meager as they are, in effect, on the lower brackets, are proposed only as an excuse to give big tax cuts to those in the high brackets. I do not really know how one can avoid that conclusion, because a reduction of 1 percentage point for a taxpayer with a tax liability of $50 is 50 cents.

But if that appears ridiculous, take 1 percentage point on a tax liability of $1,000. This gives a tax reduction, under the committee bill, of $10.

This is a costly excuse for giving a $22,000 tax reduction to a man with an income of $500,000.

Who can say that this is according to need or can be arrived at by the imposition of taxation according to ability to pay?

The issues of tax reform and tax reduction and of budgetary balance are separate issues, and there need not be a connection between the revenues to be derived and expended through each of these two or three separate actions. One may follow the other, of course, unless both receive simultaneous treatment, but each should and must stand upon its own justification.

The burden of proof of fiscal responsibility is on the administration in supporting this bill, which provides a new loophole for railroads; which continues unreasonable percentage depletion allowances for oil, gas, and the minerals; which continues a tax loophole for banks, for real estate; and which provides, as I have indicated, unjustifiable tax relief for individuals with high incomes.

Those who advocate these measures, it seems to the Senator from Tennessee, are hard put to justify them either from the standpoint of fiscal responsibility or of social justice. That burden has not been satisfied so far as I am concerned, nor will it be, in my opinion, for the American people so long as the Treasury insists on viewing my proposal, or the proposal of others of similar portent, with fiscal blindness that prevents their seeing beyond the four corners of the bill.

I wish to refer further, Mr. President, to the letter of Assistant Secretary Cohen. One of the most shocking statements to bear the official imprimatur of this administration is one contained in this letter of Assistant Secretary Cohen to Senator LONG relative to my amendment, which will be found in the RECORD of yesterday's debate, at page 36264.

In commenting on the burden of supporting and educating children—a burden which my amendment would do much to relieve—Secretary Cohen, speaking officially for the Nixon administration, stated:

> Through appropriations for education and other purposes, the cost of raising large families is already borne to a considerable extent by those who did not beget the children.

Mr. President, this illustrates the gross insensitivity, if not the social callousness, that this administration repeatedly displays toward the mass of our people. I thought we had long ago gotten beyond the point where we regarded public education as the responsibility of parents alone. I thought everyone had understood for at least the seven decades of this century, if not for the 3½ centuries of our colonial and national existence, the responsibility of government, whether it be local, State, or National, the responsibility of the whole society, in the field of education.

We do not have public education for the benefit, pecuniary or otherwise, of the parents of our children. We have public education for the benefit, betterment, and progress of the whole society. This point is cardinal to the whole question of public school development, including problems of desegregation, both North and South.

True, Mr. President, there are still some individuals who want to avoid and deny responsibility for children, for education of children. I recall, as a superintendent of education in a county in Tennessee, I sought to provide additional educational facilities; and I recall one gentleman, who had not been favored with offspring in his lifetime, but who had been so fortunate as to acquire a considerable amount of wordly goods in the form of rich farmland. He vigorously resisted increasing the county tax rate, and said to me and others that he did not want to bear any responsibility for educating the children that others beget. I find the Secretary of the Treasury following this same antediluvian principle.

I thought Thomas Jefferson successfully led the fight to settle that a long time ago. Here is what he said:

> By far the most important bill in our whole code, is that for the diffusion of knowledge among the people. No other sure foundation can be devised for the preservation of freedom and happiness.

Then later he said:

> If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, it expects what never was and never will be.

Yet, Secretary Cohen seems to be arguing with Thomas Jefferson. If he is, I should like to quote Jefferson a little further:

> Enlighten the people generally, and tyranny and oppression of both mind and will vanish.

> The tax which will be paid for the purpose of education is not more than the thousandth part of what will be paid to kings, priests, and nobles who will rise up among us if we leave the people in ignorance.

Yet, Mr. President, on December 1, 1969, we have the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in the Nixon administration writing to the U.S. Senate:

> Through appropriations for education and other purposes the costs of raising large families is already borne to a considerable extent by those who did not beget the children.

If Thomas Jefferson could hear that, to use a colloquialism, he would turn over in his grave. How many times have we condemned those who pled for segregated schools on the basis that the poor, those who do not live in the affluent suburbs, those who are black or of some Spanish-derived descent, or oriental, do not pay as much in taxes as do the richer elements of society, and therefore do not have and perhaps should not have equal school facilities, and therefore should not be entitled to invade the better public schools in the more affluent neighborhoods.

As early as 1647, with the so-called Old Deluder law, the responsibility of the community to establish schools was proclaimed. With the passage of time and further progress in education, we moved away from purely local control of education to State control, and all State systems have long since incorporated six very important principles: They are tax supported, they are under public control, they are free of charge at least through the secondary level, they are nonsectarian, they are compulsory to a certain age or grade level, they are universal in scope, and their cost is borne by general taxation.

This has been established by democratic development since the age of the Old Deluder law in 1647; and yet, we have Secretary Cohen complaining today that people of affluent income are already bearing—well, perhaps I had better read it:

> Through appropriations for education and other purposes the costs of raising large families is already borne to a considerable extent by those who did not beget the children.

Mr. President, I am thinking about the children. I do not wish to assess blame for those who brought them into the world. I wish, however, that our tax laws be fair and equitable, and whether we condemn a father and a mother for having children or whether we do not—and I do not—who can support a child on $50 a month? Is this a birth control measure? If we wish to deal in the future, with birth control, family planning, et cetera, that should be dealt with in another bill. Here we are dealing with taxation, and I am talking about the father and the mother living out in the suburbs, with a big mortgage on a little house already filled with children.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I submit to the Senator that while he is making an eloquent argument, he is using what we in debate usually refer to as a strawman technique: He is making an eloquent argument in answer to an argument the other fellow did not make.

Mr. GORE. The Senator put it in the RECORD yesterday.

Mr. LONG. I have read what the Secretary said twice. The Senator is making an eloquent argument against an argument the Secretary did not make. It would seem to me to be logical for the Senator to make his argument against the argument which the Secretary did make. That way, it might appeal to the Secretary; but I do not see how the Senator can convince somebody by answering an argument he did not make. Why does the Senator not answer the argument he did make? I have read the words the Senator referred to; but it would seem to me that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury made a logical argument, to which I would be interested in hearing a logical response, but I see no point in either knocking over a strawman or lighting a match to it. Why does the Senator not respond to the argument the Secretary made?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall be glad to. I thought I had.

Mr. LONG. I have read it twice now, while the able Senator was answering an argument the man did not make.

Mr. GORE. It might enlighten the Senator to hear it read. Let me read it aloud, if the Senator does not mind. I am almost constrained to put the whole letter in the RECORD, but since it appears on page 36264, perhaps I should not burden the taxpayers by reprinting all of the letter again. But I wish at least to read this entire paragraph:

Thus the burden of supporting children above the minimum HEW standards would be shifted from the large families which have the children—

Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. LONG. I think I understand the whole paragraph. What concerns me is that I think the Senator does not understand those words he is reading.

Mr. GORE. That is fine, if the Senator understands.

The Secretary of the Treasury said:

Thus the burden of supporting children above the minimum HEW standards would be shifted—

Now he is talking about my amendment. That is what he is talking about. Let us understand that. He is saying that my amendment would shift the burden of supporting children above the minimum HEW standards—from the large families which have the children—

That is not hard to understand—to the single persons and smaller families.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator agree with that?

Mr. GORE. Yes. That is what it says.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator agree that his amendment would do what the Secretary says in that respect?

Mr. GORE. I agree that my amendment would provide the most tax relief for the taxpayers who need it most, those with the most children to support.

Mr. LONG. That is not precisely what the Secretary said.

Mr. GORE. All right. Let me read it again.

Mr. LONG. That sentence speaks clearly for itself, it seems to me.

Mr. GORE. If that is clear to the able junior Senator from Louisiana, it is clear to me. We will then go to the next sentence.

Mr. LONG. It means just what is says, that is all.

Mr. GORE. The next sentence reads:

Through appropriations for education and other purposes the costs of raising large families is already borne to a considerable extent by those who did not beget the children.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator agree with that?

Mr. GORE. That is what the Secretary says.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator agree that is correct, that the Senator's amendment would tend to do that?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think to use that as an argument against a principle of equitable taxation is older than Thomas Jefferson. I thought that was settled in the fight in Virginia. I thought that was settled by the democratic process that began, as I said, with the "Old Deluder" law. Let me continue to read. This is the conclusion he reaches:

We believe the committee has acted wisely in lowering the burden on all taxpayers whose incomes are above the minimum HEW levels, particularly upon those whose incomes are modestly above such levels, rather than—

Does the Senator follow me?

I continue to read—

rather than distributing the tax relief by size of families.

There, Mr. President, we have it. He does not wish to distribute tax relief in accordance with the size of families. The affluent people who are either single or have but few children are already, as he says, bearing a heavy burden in educating the children that others beget.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand what the Assistant Secretary is saying here, it is that when we get just above the poverty level, he wants to distribute the tax reduction according to need rather than according to number.

Mr. GORE. He does not say that.

Mr. LONG. That is what I understand.

Mr. GORE. How does he arrive at the conclusion of giving a $22,000 reduction to a man with $500,000 in income? Is that need?

Mr. LONG. The pending bill——

Mr. GORE. Answer my question. Is that need? The Senator laid down the yardstick.

Mr. LONG. The tax reduction in the pending bill with respect to a man above an income of $25,000 is not based on need.

Mr. GORE. The Senator violates his own yardstick when he gets above $25,000.

Mr. LONG. No, I do not violate it.

Mr. GORE. On what basis?

Mr. LONG. It is an adjustment for people in the lower income brackets.

Mr. GORE. That is a mechanism for doing something. Why is it done? The Senator started by saying it is on a basis of need. Now he is running from it.

Mr. LONG. I have never for a moment contended that where we reduce rates it is justified for a person in the upper tax brackets on the basis that he needs the money. He does not have to have bread or other things.

The Senator would increase taxes on a lot of single people and married couples and couples with one dependent who need their money every bit as much as the people he would like to help. In fact, the Senator would increase the tax benefit more for the people for whom he would provide tax increases.

Unfortunately, a lot of people who are taxed under the pending bill would be taxed even if the Senator's amendment were to provide that they can be said to need the money and expenses.

I would like to have a tax system work on such a basis that we would not tax anyone who has any pressing need for the money.

The Government needs money, and it would be inflationary if we were not to try to maintain some balance in our budget.

May I state the argument that I understand the Secretary to be stating here?

Mr. GORE. Surely.

Mr. LONG. It seems to me that the Senator is answering an argument that the Secretary did not make.

It seems to me that the Secretary is saying—I think we will both agree—that we do not want to tax a person whom we define as being in the poverty bracket.

The Senator modified the amendments he offered in the committee to take that into account.

What the Secretary was advocating and what the committee seemed to agree on did more for the poor than did the Gore amendment.

So we agree, I would think, that where a person is regarded as being in the poverty bracket, he should not have to pay any income tax at all.

I submit that what the Secretary is saying is that when you tax these taxpayers who are in the lowest tax brackets—and I am talking about the people who are paying at the 13, 14, and 15 percent rate—we ought to tax those people who are paying at the lower rate according to need. And the Senator's approach based on the need to which the Secretary is referring would place a heavier tax on single people or married couples or couples with but one child that would be a heavier tax burden based on need than the administration seems to think we ought to impose on those people.

The Senator points out that those people are already paying taxes for the support and assistance of families to educate children. And he contends that the big families, if there is no greater need for them, ought to pay something, little though it might be, for the education and support of their own children, the same way in which a single person who is equally in need ought to pay taxes. It is also fair that a married person equally in need ought to pay for the support of his own children.

If we were to raise the exemption to the point that the Senator would like to raise it, we would not be talking about a bill that would cost $9 billion in revenue, but we would be talking about a bill that would cost $50 billion in revenue.

Unfortunately, if we did that, we know that we would have a huge Government deficit and would be adding to the inflationary spiral and might well take away from those people, in terms of inflation, as much as we would hope to do for them in terms of tax reduction.

Mr. GORE. I am grateful to have the explanation of the Secretary's letter by the distinguished chairman of the committee. It is enlightening. But the letter stands as written. The Senator's explanation does not change it. The letter can be found in yesterday's RECORD.

The Senator from Louisiana made a statement, however, that I must challenge. He said that I propose—that is, that the senior Senator from Tennessee proposes—to increase the tax on single taxpayers and on taxpayers having small families, for the benefit, as I believe he said, of taxpayers having large families. That is not the case. My amendment would not increase the tax on any taxpayer above the tax levied by present law.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield, so that we might just get together on this point, I am talking about what would be done relative to the committee bill.

Mr. GORE. All right. I appreciate the amendment of the Senator's statement compared with the committee bill.

My amendment would provide a heavier tax liability for some taxpayers. I want to come to that. But before doing so, I wish to make it perfectly plain that my amendment does not increase the tax liability of any taxpayer over the present law.

Let us begin with single persons. A single taxpayer having an income of $1,700 would have a tax reduction of $109 under the committee bill. It would be $100 under my amendment. So that is evening up.

Now I should like to discuss the status of a single taxpayer having an income of $3,000. The committee bill would provide him a tax reduction of $96. My amendment would provide a tax reduction of $131. So my amendment would not discriminate against him.

Take a single tax payer with $5,000 taxable income. The committee bill would give him a tax reduction of $52. My amendment would give him a tax reduction of $76.

A single taxpayer with $10,000 taxable income: The committee bill would give him a tax reduction of $122. My amendment would give him a tax reduction of $130.

Now let us come to a single taxpayer with an income of $15,000, and at that point the committee bill would give him a tax reduction of $304; my amendment, $278.

Let us now come to the point at which the committee bill would give him more tax reduction. A single taxpayer with an income of $20,000 would receive from the committee bill a tax reduction of $626; my amendment, $576.

At the $50,000 income level, the committee bill would provide a tax reduction of $3,104; my amendment, $2,482.

At the $100,000 level, the committee bill would give him a tax reduction of $5,104; my amendment would provide a tax reduction of $2,664. The further up the scale one goes from there, the greater the disparity.

I respectfully suggest, Mr. President, that single taxpayers with hundreds of thousands of dollars of income derived from this economy, which belongs to all Americans, derived from the processes of government and society of which he is such a wonderful beneficiary, does in fact owe a social responsibility to contribute to the government that provides the education and the well-being, in large measure, for the mass of our people.

I ask unanimous consent to have this table printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Provisions as effective for taxable years beginning in 1973.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking to an amendment which would cost the Government several billion dollars a year—roughly, $5.8 billion a year—more in revenue loss than would the committee bill.

If the Senator would direct himself to an increase in the exemption to about $800 per person rather than $1,000, he would be speaking in terms of about the same revenue loss as entailed in the bill reported by the committee. If the Senator is directing himself to a revenue loss of approximately the same amount, his amendment, tailored to an $800 figure, which would be about the same revenue loss as the committee bill, would involve the shift of approximately $1 billion of tax reduction from those with either no family or with families of a wife and no children in favor and to the benefit of those with families of four or more.

At the point where one has a wife and two children, there would appear to be a slight balance in favor of the Senator's argument in terms of revenue impact, but not much. In order to achieve that, the Senator's amendment would sacrifice the advantages of simplicity that are gained by increasing the standard deduction, which benefits middle-income families, from 10 percent up to 15 percent, and with the top limit from $1,000 up to $2,000. There is something in it that does not meet the eye, and that is the great amount of inconvenience to people to have to keep the records to prepare the tax returns in order to itemize a claim for deductions, the expense that occurs to a great number of people because of having to pay someone to advise and consult, and the time involved in going to those people for help in preparing one's income tax return. So there are advantages in the committee bill in addition to the rate reduction that the committee voted.

While, of course, the Senator's amendment would do much good for many people, if it is reduced to the same revenue loss, it would also impose additional taxes on a great number of people, the majority of whom are in the same earning brackets that the Senator would seek to benefit.

Mr. GORE. I thank the able Senator. I suggest that he be careful lest he set up a strawman for himself?

The Treasury letter concludes by comparing an increase in the personal exemption to $800 with the tax reduction provisions in the Finance Committee bill.

It is asserted that my proposal is not as effective as the pending bill for single persons, married couples with no dependents, and married couples with one dependent. I am offering an amendment to increase the personal exemption to $1,000. But even taking the administration figure of an $800 exemption, to which the able Senator has just referred, it is worthwhile noting that with respect to taxpayers, about whom the administration is so concerned—I call it to the Senator's attention in response to his statement—the administration asserts that at an $800 personal exemption, single persons would receive $392 million less relief than under the committee bill. But almost one-half of this excess relief goes to high-bracket taxpayers.

If the Senator wishes to beat his breast for the benefit of the single taxpayers in the income brackets of hundreds of thousands of dollars and aline himself with the philosophy expressed in the Assistant Secretary's letter, he has every right to do so. But it is certainly contrary to all the "grandma" amendments I have heard him offer on the floor as amendments to the social security bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator offering me assurance that if his amendment for a $1,000 exemption is rejected, he will not offer one for an exemption of a lesser figure, perhaps $900, $800, $950—some figure less than $1,000?

Mr. GORE. The assurance I am pleased to give the Senator is that should the Senate err in not adopting the amendment to raise the personal exemption to $1,000, I shall then offer it at $900 or $800, or, indeed, I might even split the hundreds. I am very strongly opposed to the rate changes recommended in the committee bill. As I have said, and I repeat, the meager tax reduction given in the lower brackets by rate changes can be viewed, in my opinion, as but excuses to provide big tax cuts for the high brackets. I am opposed to it and I offer as a substitute for that proposal tax relief for those who need it most, the people at the low-income level with families to support.

Yes, I will give assurance, not ad infinitum, but until I win.

Mr. LONG. I had assumed the Senator would do so. If we were debating the Senator's amendment just as he offered it, I would be willing to debate it on the ground that the Government cannot stand the revenue loss, but I anticipated, and I am not constrained to say that I am happy about the proposition, the Senator would offer it at a lesser figure if it failed at $1,000.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. The Senator had better stay around because support has been rising for the $1,000 exemption in the last few days, and, particularly, if those on the other side of the aisle who have introduced amendments vote as they have introduced amendments. I think they will, I anticipate that they will, and I shall shout with glee when they do.

Mr. LONG. I am equally impressed by the fact that during the course of this debate we have had some difficulty in prevailing upon Senators to be present to hear the arguments. At the moment, the Senator is addressing himself ably to this proposition, as he has on previous occasions. It seems to me that we could get on more expeditiously with the bill if Senators would plan to be in the Chamber and hear the presentations both for and against proposals. It is somewhat frustrating to find that many people vote when they have not heard the presentations. I think the Senator has made a good presentation for his amendment and in due course I shall make a presentation for the committee position.

I regret that the Senator has been compelled to make his presentation to a large number of empty chairs and I expect the same thing will be true with respect to those who think they will do a better job than the Senator—not in debating the proposition but in presenting the best thing that could be worked out.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President (Mr. BELLMON in the chair), the observations of the Senator from Louisiana are pertinent. Of course, it is a matter of regret and disappointment that I do not have the entire membership of the Senate present for a debate on a principle of taxation for which I have labored and fought for several years. I guess I am a bit vain in assuming that if more Senators had heard my arguments the easier the victory would be. But be that as it may, I am doing the best I can, talking to as many Senators as I can, and perhaps the people will have an opportunity to read the RECORD. At least, it is the only way I have of undertaking today to persuade the Senate. I must add that frequently Senators have aides either in the Chamber or in the gallery who take notes on points made during the course of debate, so one's efforts here are not entirely without effect. Nevertheless, I do thank the able Senator.

Mr. President, if democracy is to survive we must provide for the children of today in order that the citizens of tomorrow be healthy of mind, body, and spirit. In order to do so we must tax the wealth and income, where it is, to educate and nurture the children, where they are.

I am so surprised that a very enlightened, delightful, and personable man such as Secretary Cohen would write a letter based on the assumptions to which I have already referred. I find him most agreeable and erudite. It is beyond me to explain why he would write such a letter but the letter is here and it is advanced as an argument against the adoption of the amendment which I propose.

I wish now to return to the adequacy of the personal exemption which is also referred to in the letter of Secretary Cohen. His letter goes on to set forth the most shocking proposition imaginable. The Treasury asserts that my proposal to increase the personal exemption will produce a level of taxfree income for the necessities of life that "substantially exceeds the minimum amount needed to sustain each individual." Marvelous.

Now, one would read this astounding statement to mean that the Treasury believes a child can be housed, clothed, fed, and educated for a cost of $50 a month, but even the Treasury does not believe that, because the Treasury itself urges a low income allowance of $1,100 for a family. Thus, for a family of four, the Treasury offers the comforting proposition that this family can provide the necessities of life on $3,500 a year, or $72.91 per person per month.

Now, the Treasury says this is a reasonable minimum amount to sustain each individual member of the family. Is there a Senator who will accept that as factual? The Department of Labor does not accept it as factual. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare does not accept it as factual. Why should the Senate? Compare my proposal to increase the personal exemption. In 1970 my proposal would give the same family of four the sum of $3,800 of tax free income for the necessities of life or $79.17 per person per month.

Is that enough? I do not think so.

The interesting point is, how can anyone explain on what basis the Treasury concludes that $72.91 per month is a reasonable amount to feed and clothe a dependent, but that $79.17 per month provided by my proposal "substantially exceeds" the minimum required amount?

Ah, that is cutting the hair very fine.

What is involved here is a principle, the practicality of millions of American citizens trying to make ends meet. They are having to pinch their pennies and count their nickels and dimes.

Even when fully effective, my proposal would allow only $104.17 per month as an exemption from Federal income tax to feed, clothe, house, and educate each child in a family of four. It does not approach the level which the Department of Labor says is necessary—let me use the right term—to enjoy a moderate standard of living.

You know, Mr. President, one way a Senator, by speaking longer than perhaps he should, can reach his fellow Senators is that now and then a colleague will enter the Chamber who has not been benefited, regaled, or elevated by the previous remarks of the Senator. I see in the Chair the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON) who presides over this body with such grace. I see to my left the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN) who has been in the Chamber during part of the remarks I have made. So, to their attention and to others who have come into the Chamber—I see a conference of four Senators underway on my right—I will try to speak loud enough for them to hear—the Department of Labor conducted a study over a period of years and arrived at the conclusion that the amount necessary to maintain a moderate standard of living, defined as that amount which provides for the maintenance of health and social well-being, the nurture of children, and participation in community activities, would be for a family of four, as of October last year, $9,484.

Now, Mr. President, the amendment I have offered does not provide an exemption for citizens and taxpayers in the State of Oklahoma anything approaching that level which your own administration says is necessary to provide a moderate standard of living.

All my amendment would provide as exempt income, exempt from Federal taxation, is an average of $104.17 per month, even when it is fully effective in 1973. For next year, it would provide exempt from Federal taxation $79.17 per month each for a man, woman, and child.

Yet, the Secretary of the Treasury says that this "substantially exceeds" what he says is necessary, the $72.19 per month.

Ah, Mr. President, we have involved here a principle of taxation which must be preserved, the exemption from Federal income tax for each taxpayer, rich or poor, enough for a minimum existence, before the Federal Government levies a tax on his income.

I am sure that most mothers in this country would feel that an extra $30 a month to feed and clothe a child was very little. But little as it is, it is needed. Senators have but to inquire of their constituents to find that out.

But the Treasury of the United States is telling them that this pittance would be a luxury for which they should pay in higher taxes.

Further, I must note that the allowance at present in the bill is already obsolete. The Labor Department has just announced a new poverty level of $3,600 for an urban family of four.

That, Mr. President, is $100 above the low-income allowance provided in the pending bill.

So, the bill which the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury proposes and defends is already out of date by other departments of the same administration of the Government of the same country.

Continued inflation will continue to erode the effectiveness of the low-income allowance in the bill. Since it is tied to a $600 personal exemption, it has already been out-distanced by inflation. My proposal would bring the personal exemption in line with the cost of living. Thus, under my proposal, all—including those in poverty—will get a start toward catching up with the cost-of-living increase that has taken place since 1948 when the $600 level was set. Those in poverty will soon have some buffer against future erosion of the low-income allowance due to inflation.

Mr. President, I have spoken now for more than 3 hours. I feel that I must close. I appreciate the attention of a number of Senators who have remained in the Chamber throughout the debate and those who have been present at one time or another.

I should like to conclude by saying that the Tax Reform Act of 1969, as reported by the Finance Committee, is a signficant step in achieving greater equity in our tax system. It embodies two principles; tax reform and tax relief.

As I see it, tax reform should ensure that those who are paying too little of the total tax burden relative to their income, because of special tax preferences, will bear a fairer share of the total tax burden.

Tax reduction should provide tax relief for those who are paying too much in taxes relative to their income and need.

In evaluating the provisions of the bill, both those that provide for tax reform and those that provide for tax relief, an overriding yardstick must be applied.

This standard is embodied in the Cordell Hull principle of progressivity—taxation based on ability to pay. This was at the heart of the successful move to adopt a Federal income tax as a national policy.

To achieve these ends of social justice, the personal exemption of income from Federal income tax must be raised from the present, unrealistic, unfair $600 to a minimum, I believe, of $1,000. I think the most out-of-date provision in the tax law, the most socially unjustified provision in our Federal income tax law, is the low $600 exemption.

Fairness and equity require tax reductions for those who are now paying too much in taxes, primarily the low- and middle-income taxpayers. This tax relief, in my opinion, should be granted in a simple, easily understood fashion, and pursuant to the fundamental basis of a fair tax system, a progressive tax structure.

This general statement raises questions about the specific proposals in the bill, to which I have already referred. I refer to the rate changes in the bill. Those changes were approved by an 8-to-8 vote in the Senate Finance Committee and, of course, were endorsed by the administration. These rates, as I have illustrated, are actually regressive. They would undo much of the reforms so laboriously achieved in the remainder of the bill.

These rate changes providing for a 1-percentage point reduction in the bottom income brackets, and up to an 8-percentage point reduction in the high brackets, should not be adopted in any event. And I wish to emphasize that I would not support—I would resist—as an individual item rate changes proposed in the bill irrespective of what is done about raising the personal exemption.

In my opinion, there is no social, political, or economic justification for reducing the maximum rates in one 5-year period from 91 to 65 percent.

What is the justification for that? Is it because others are not sacrificing equally? What of the men who are dying in Vietnam? Is it because we do not have budgetary needs? What of the community facilities projects in our respective States for which we are unable to secure either loans or grants? What of the educational needs, the health needs? Is it because our debt is not large enough?

Oh, Mr. President, there is no justification for a big tax cut in the high brackets.

The distinguished chairman of the committee said, in one instance, that the reductions in the bill were based on need, but then from that he quickly retreated and acknowledged that the rate changes were not based on need.

On what basis do we proceed, then, to give tax reduction if we eliminate need, if we eliminate social justification, if we eliminate budgetary requirements? What, Mr. President, is the basis for it?

Describe it as you will, it is an unneeded, unjustified, undeserved tax cut in the high brackets, based not on need, not on budgetary requirements—I do not know how it can be adequately based.

How should we provide tax relief? I think the fairest and simplest means of providing tax relief is to increase the personal exemption. To what level? Frankly, I would like to go to $1,000 immediately, but I do not believe that would be possible to achieve just now. Therefore, I have proposed this be approached at the rate of an increase of $100 per year until, in 1973 and thereafter, the personal exemption would be $1,000 for each taxpayer and each dependent.

Why is this necessary? I have already stated.

I close by suggesting that the amendment is offered as a substitute for the unjustified tax reduction provided by unfair changes in tax rates; and therefore, I plead, as earnestly as I can, for the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I have offered, which applies to various sections in the bill, be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the study to which I referred earlier in the colloquy be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is imperative that we provide some measure of tax relief for the average American. Unfortunately, the tax relief in the Senate Finance Committee bill gives too much to taxpayers who do not need it, and not enough to those who should have more relief. Using figures provided by Leon Keyserling, former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and not considering the reform provisions, whose future remains uncertain, taxpayers with income of $50,000 and over, representing only 0.4 of the total tax returns, would receive 13.4 percent of the tax cuts. Considering a percentage increase in after-tax income, there is the same picture of unnecessary tax relief for the wealthy and inadequate tax relief for the lower income tax payer. In the $5,000 to $10,000 bracket, taxpayers receive about the same dollar relief as those in the $20,000 to $30,000 bracket, but much less favorable tax relief than those in the $20,000 to $50,000 group. Using this standard of comparisons the tax relief provision extends immensely more favorable treatment for taxpayers above $50,000 income. I do not think that aid to the wealthy is what is meant by tax relief. These provisions only add to the presently grossly inequitable tax code.

We must concentrate tax relief on the lower and middle income-tax payer. To accomplish this purpose, Senator Gore and I offered an amendment raising the personal exemption to $1,000. This amendment received only three votes in executive session of the Senate Finance Committee. Various other amendments for raising personal exemptions were offered in executive session but all failed to pass; the last by a tie vote.

I will continue this battle to raise the personal exemption on the Senate floor. Increasing the personal exemption to $1,000 is the quickest and easiest way of providing tax relief to most Americans. The level and pattern of family exemptions in the United States has undergone many changes since 1913 (see table 1). The present equal per capita arrangement was started in 1914. The $600 per capita exemptions were started in 1958.

Today, the $600 exemption is ludicrously inadequate and is more of an insult than a benefit to the American taxpayer. Since that figure was first adopted the cost of living has increased by 40 percent. To expect the American taxpayer to provide the basic minimum necessities of life for himself, his wife, and his children on $50 per month each is as unrealistic and antiquated as crossing the Atlantic in a sailing vessel.

What is the basic purpose of these exemptions?

There have been differing views, but probably the most common view, and the one to which most of us hold, is that taxes should not be applied to the income of persons until their minimum basic needs have been allowed for. It was in 1948 that the last change in the amount of the exemption was made. At that time it was increased from $500 to $600, the $500 rate having been adopted in 1942 under wartime need for increased tax income, a reduction from $750. Thus we have never returned even to the prewar situation, let alone modernize the tax exemption in accord with more recent cost of living changes.

In 1947, the Treasury Department produced a study of individual income tax exemptions, which included as an appendix a consideration of "Function and Purpose of Individual Income Tax Exemptions." Under a section discussing minimum living standard there appears this paragraph:

"According to a widely accepted view, the exemption should be at least adequate to cover some minimum essential living costs, such as the amount required for reasonable maintenance. It is conceded that the adjustment of exemptions to living costs may not be exact and that under emergency conditions it may be necessary to go below ordinary minima. For the long run, however, it is to be regarded as essential to exempt amounts required to maintain the individual and his family in health and efficiency."

You will note that the Treasury, in this wartime era, spoke of going "below ordinary minimums" as only a temporary procedure, that it might be necessary "under emergency conditions." Certainly those emergency conditions have long since passed, the economy has prospered, the cost of living has risen drastically—but the $600 remains where it was 20 years ago.

Under the concept of the income tax, with the exemption's purpose being that of allowing an untaxed minimum for health and efficiency, says the Treasury study:

"Ability to pay does not commence until a point is reached in the income scale where the minimum means of life have been obtained."

What is that minimum means of life today? How does it compare with the minimums left untaxed for the average American family?

In 1948, when the $500 was lifted to $600, a family of four had an exemption of $2,400. But these were 1948 dollars. To be equivalent, because of dollar inflation alone, moderate as it has been year by year, the sum would now need to be $3,288, or $822 per person.

But what were average incomes like in those days? Fortunately, wages are not only much greater today, but living standards—acceptable minimums for family life—are also much greater. This is reflected in a study released in March of this year by the Department of Labor, measuring the income needed for a family of four. This is a revision of the work produced in the fall of 1959 dealing with city worker's family budget estimates. That budget measured the needs of a family of four—an employed husband aged 38, a wife not employed outside the home, and two school-age children, a boy of 13 and a girl of 8. It was not a luxury or ideal budget, but was described as one presenting a "level of adequate living according to standards prevailing in large cities of the United States in recent years."

As an example of the kinds of items calculated, the budget assumes for the husband the purchase of five shirts a year and not quite two pairs of shoes annually. The wife's dress allowance is about 2 and a half new dresses a year. The budget allows not for new cars but for the purchase of a used car every 4 years—and for only 80 percent of most city families; calculations for New York, Philadelphia, and Boston.

U.S. average annual cost in spring of 1967 was $9,076 for total budget and $7,221 for cost of goods and services in the budget. Because of increases in prices it has been estimated that the cost of the same costs and services in autumn of 1968 would have been about $7,630. Of the total, food accounts for $2,235; housing was $2,311, transportation, $912; clothing and personal care, $1,069; and medical care, $520.

Other economic studies have placed the needs on families in the same general range within the last 2 or 3 years. For a two-person family, the same calculations give a minimum of $4,690, and for a family of five, with the oldest child not over 16, the total budget comes to $8,020.

This, of course, is considerably more than the amount that many thousands and even millions of families have as income; $3,000 is often cited as the poverty line. Yet our present $600 exemption provides only $2,400 deductible for a family of four. A $1,000 exemption for four persons would still be more than 50 percent below the family budget I have been noting.

We in the Congress must be the initiators and the guardians of the welfare of the unorganized common man.

The times have changed. This is no longer 1948, and a lot has happened to the economy in the last 20 years to make features of that era outmoded. Outmoded certainly is the $600 exemption, unrealistic, inequitable, and undeserved penalty for the taxpayer who is in the lower brackets. To refer once more to the Treasury paper I have cited:

Perhaps the major function of the exemptions is to determine minimum levels of income subject to tax.

We are in all too many instances today taxing the poor, those whose incomes are below the income level needed for adequate living standards of decency, perhaps even for some who are below the income level which we designate as that of poverty. It is time we stopped taxing the poor and gave them an equitable share in the prosperity of the Nation. An exemption of $600 per person—I might remind you also that until 1939 it was $1,000 for a single person and $2,500 for a married couple without children—an exemption of $600 per person is unrealistic and unfair. It should be changed to $1,000.

While increasing the personal exemption to $1,000 is both desirable and necessary it may prove impossible to achieve on the Senate floor. President Nixon has already suggested that he will veto a greatly unbalanced bill—i.e., a bill that loses more tax revenue than it generates. A $1,000 exemption, even spread over a series of years, will result in an unbalanced bill.

In the event that the amendments to increase the personal exemption to $1,000 fails, I will offer an amendment which will provide much more equitable tax relief but will not result in any more tax revenue loss than the bill approved by the Senate Finance Committee. This amendment would establish a minimum standard deduction phased in on the same basis as the Senate proposal for low-income allowance, coupled with an increase in the personal exemption to $650 in 1970, $700 in 1971, and $800 in 1972. The following tables indicate some of the consequences of this amendment:

[1] $800 personal exemption and $1,100 minimum standard deduction.

Note: Assumes deductions equal to 15 percent of income, or minimum standard deduction (low-income allowance)—whichever is greater. Surtax excluded.

This amendment clearly concentrates tax relief among the lower and middle income taxpayers. For the taxpayer in the $7,000 to $10,000 income bracket my proposal will provide 21.9 percent in tax relief compared with only 14.8 percent relief in the Senate Finance bill. For taxpayers in the $10,000 to $15,000 bracket my proposal provides for 21.8 percent tax relief compared to 21.3 percent provided by the Senate Finance bill. Taxpayers in these and lower tax brackets desperately need this tax relief because they bear a disproportionate share of the existing tax burden, and endure the full brunt of the present high tax and high interest rate policies and pay more than their share of the highly regressive State, local, and property taxes.

If the attempt to increase the personal exemption fails on the Senate floor, and I do not believe it will, I will offer an amendment that I also offered in executive session, but which failed to pass 10 to 7. This amendment does not affect the low-income allowance provisions or the provisions increasing the standard deduction. It does, however, redistribute the relief provided by rate reductions and concentrates such relief among the lower income and middle income Americans. I will offer the proposed change in the rate as follows: the 14 percent rate cut to 9 percent; the 15 percent rate cut to 13 percent; the 16 percent rate cut to 15 percent; the 17 percent rate cut to 16 percent; the 19 percent rate cut to 17 percent. Every taxpayer would receive a tax reduction but the bulk of the tax relief would be concentrated on lower and middle class taxpayers. Assuming the proposed rate changes as indicated above, my proposal contrasted with the committee bill, would affect certain income levels as follows:

For a couple with two dependents, $7,500 in income, the Senate Finance bill provides $111 in tax reduction, my proposal would provide $161. For a couple with two dependents, $10,000 income, the committee bill provides $156, my proposal provides $206. With an income of $12,500 the committee bill provides for $220, my proposal would provide for $267. With an income of $15,000, the committee bill provides for $216, my proposal provides for $240. While I hope for a great deal more, this is the very least that should be done.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, if we are to bring about true tax reform, it is required that we give some true tax relief to the people who bear such a great portion of this Nation's total tax burden—the average taxpaying citizens. To my mind, the simplest, easiest, and most sensible means of achieving this goal is to accept the proposal put before us by the Senator from Tennessee. I might add that I have believed this approach deserves merit for quite some time and have previously cosponsored legislation aimed at the same purpose.

The present $600 exemption was established in 1948, when economic conditions were quite different from those we experience today. The basic cost of living has gone up by about 50 percent in that period of two decades, yet we have left the exemption at $600. The amendment before us would not only recognize the rising cost of living and erosion of the dollar over the past 20 years, but would serve to direct the tax relief granted toward the middle- and lower-income groups, giving greater relief to all taxpayers with up to $15,000 in adjusted gross income, and the most relief to those with the lowest incomes.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we face a fundamental choice in voting on this amendment. In contrast to the bill presented us, it treats the average American taxpayer more liberally. I am fully aware that we will face other choices if we go this route, but I am sure the citizens of this country would applaud not only a law that recognized their need for more equitable taxation, but a Congress willing to make the necessary choices in the areas of taxation and spending. I think the taxpayers deserve this.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I support in principal the proposal to increase the existing $600 personal income tax exemption. Somewhere along the line we seem to have lost sight of the fact that the personal exemption is designed to allow the taxpayer to retain a sufficient amount of money—tax-free—to enable him to maintain a minimum standard of living; to provide food, clothing, shelter, and medical services that are the indispensable necessities of life.

Certainly it would be the height of fantasy to contend that the present $600 allowance would sustain even the barest needs of today's taxpayers.

I have urged the adoption of a more realistic rate of exemption since 1947, the year before the allowance was raised from $500 to the present $600. At that time I sought an increase from $500 to $750 and, in offering the amendment, made the following statement which is as apt today as then:

> I have said over and over again that I think that is the point where tax relief ought to begin, namely, with people in the low-income brackets, the low-wage earners, the people who are having a struggle to provide the actual necessities of life. I believe this is the way to do it. A reduction of taxes at the bottom level by an increase in personal exemption affects everyone all the way across the board. The man making $100,000 a year receives some relief and some benefit, and the man in between gets his proportionate relief according to his earnings and ability to pay. Many a man is struggling today to live on a comparatively decent standard. * * * It is obvious that we should start reducing taxes by helping those at the bottom of the ladder who have the hardest struggle. (Congressional Record, p. 5924, 5/28/47.)

Recent statistics reveal that, for a family of four, the present $600 exemption provides a lower amount of tax-free income for the necessities of life than was available for a family of four in 1940. Yet, since that date, the cost of living has risen more than 2½ times, as reflected in the Consumer Price Index, from 48.8 in 1940 to 128 at the present time. And still the taxpayer is allowed no more than a meager $600 exemption.

Let me repeat, Mr. President, the reason for the personal income tax exemption. It is, according to a study prepared by the Treasury Department during the period when we last increased the allowance—1947—to allow enough money "to cover some minimum essential living costs, such as the amount required for reasonable maintenance. It is conceded that the adjustment of exemptions to living costs may not be exact and that under emergency conditions it may be necessary to go below ordinary minima. For the long run, however, it is regarded as essential to exempt amounts required to maintain the individual and his family in health and efficiency. Ability to pay does not commence until a point is reached in the income scale where the minimum means of life have been obtained."

This Nation has always been sympathetic with the problem of the poor and the disadvantaged, and that concern certainly has been intensified since President Johnson announced his war on poverty. Many studies, analyses, and recommendations relating to the problems of poverty have come forth since that time.

The most recent report which comes to my attention is the report of the President's Commission on Income Maintenance Programs issued November 12, 1969.

The Commission explained:

> The poverty living standard which the Commission used is the widely used poverty index, developed by the Social Security Administration. This index is based on the Department of Agriculture's measure of the cost of a temporary low-budget, nutritious diet for households of various sizes. The poverty index is simply this food budget multiplied by three to reflect the fact that food typically represents one-third of the expenses of a low-income family. The resulting figure is the minimum income needed to buy a subsistence level of goods and services; the 25 million people whose incomes fall below the index are poor, while those above it are, officially at least, nonpoor. According to this poverty index, in 1968 a nonfarm family of four required a minimum income of $3,553 per year . . . to meet its basic expenses.

Thus, Mr. President, the Government has established the line of poverty at $3,553 for a family of four and yet the pending bill, with its present $600 personal exemption and standard deduction of $1,100, would in the case of a family of four, begin taxing anything above $3,500. Such a situation seems hard to square with a bill described as one to provide for tax reform and relief. Where is the equity—the justice—the humaneness in this situation?

As I said in 1947:

> If our Government can stand any loss of revenue—if now is the time to make a reduction in income taxes—let us start by including in any tax reduction bill that we enact relief for those people who need it most by raising personal exemptions sufficiently to take them off the tax rolls. (Congressional Record, p. 11337, 12/12/47.)

It is estimated that over 80 percent of the tax relief provided by increasing the personal exemption would go to wage earners with incomes under $15,000 and 20 percent to those earning more than $15,000. Surely the vast number of taxpayers fall into the under $15,000 category and that is where we should concentrate efforts to provide tax relief. That is where relief is needed.

These are the people who form the backbone of this Nation—these are the people feeling the pinch of inflation—these are the people who are carrying the burden—and these are the people who need help.

Mr. President, that help—that relief—can best be provided in the simple and direct fashion of increasing the personal income tax exemption.

Our primary concern in enacting tax reform and tax reduction legislation should be with those taxpayers in the lower- and middle-income brackets who are trying desperately to maintain their standards of living in the face of ever-rising costs. These are the people who frequently must borrow money from banks and other sources in a continuing struggle to keep pace, to educate their children and, hopefully, to enjoy some of the fruits of America's present high standard of living.

Mr. President, however much we would like to provide these exemptions and this relief to the low-income groups we must consider the cost. I am advised that the Treasury Department estimates that if we should adopt the Gore amendment, the pending amendment, to increase the personal exemption to a thousand dollars, we would incur a loss in revenue of some $12.7 billion annually. The loss may be even more than that. I am not sure. But, according to my information, these figures were issued by the Treasury Department on November 29, 1969.

If we should increase the personal exemption to $900, that would incur a loss of revenue of $9.7 billion annually. An increase in the personal exemption to $800 would incur a loss of revenue of $6.6 billion annually. An increase to $700 in the personal exemption would incur a loss of revenue of $3.4 billion annually.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The figures that the Senator just quoted are correct, as I understand them, as to the cost of raising the exemptions. However, they do not take into consideration the other features of the Gore amendment which raise the low-income allowances, and so forth. For example, on the pending amendment, it would bring it up from a $12.7 billion loss to $14.8 billion.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand that. The figures related to the increase in exemptions are correct. They are the latest, so far as I know.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There are some other features in the Gore amendment that would entail further loss of revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator.

One must always wonder, under these circumstances, if such projections of revenue losses took into account the fact that an increase in the personal income tax exemption would permit taxpayers to retain more of their wages to meet personal expenses and the cost of living. Instead of using this money to pay more taxes, it could be used to provide for the essentials of life. Money spent in the normal course of trade by our small-income earners goes for food, clothing, shelter, and the other necessities. Such expenditures ultimately go back into the marketplace, into industry, thereby enabling it to expand, to create more jobs, and more profit opportunities—all of which are sources for additional tax levies.

Let me assure my colleagues that during the more than 22 years that I have sought a more realistic personal income tax exemption, I have never lost sight of the equally important need to maintain our fiscal integrity to the fullest possible extent.

Fiscal prudence demands, of course, that we seek to balance the budget, and I am willing to work with Members in seeking that objective.

I am for a sound economy; but an economy that must survive on a disproportionate tax upon the earnings of the low- and middle-income taxpayer—a tax that deprives him of those essentials that are needed and necessary to provide for him and his family a minimum standard of living—can hardly be said to be sound. Certainly it is of no concern to that taxpayer that he has a so-called sound economy if he is still deprived of the fruits of such an economy.

Mr. President, I believe that the time has come to be honest with ourselves and with the American people. If we are going to afford tax relief to the heavily burdened taxpayers of this Nation, let us give it where it is needed most. Let us give it to the multitude of families of four, five, or more persons, who are trying desperately to raise and to educate their children in the face of ever-increasing costs—let us give it to them, America's long-suffering low-income, low-wage taxpayer.

Mr. President, I would not want to conclude my remarks without paying tribute to the chairman and members of the Committee on Finance, who labored long and hard to bring this measure to the Senate floor. I support some of their recommendations and, of course, take exception to some, but I commend them for their diligence and thoroughness in bringing this far-reaching and complicated measure to the floor. They made every effort to keep all Members of the Senate informed of their decisions in a continuing and most effective manner, and I, for one, am most appreciative of their courtesy.

Since I have mentioned one exception that I take to the committee's recommendation, Mr. President, I want to mention one that I am in full accord with, and that relates to the treatment of interest on State and local obligations. On September 26, I introduced an amendment to the tax bill on this matter and stated at that time that I was "unalterably opposed to any attempt by the Federal Government to tax, directly or indirectly, interest on State and local obligations."

I am highly pleased to see that the committee agreed with this position and adopted the objectives of my amendment. I sincerely hope that the Senate conferees will stand firm in conference and that this provision of the Senate bill will be retained.

With respect to the pending amendment, no one in this body would be more happy than I to support it and to raise the personal exemption to $1,000, if we could do that without doing injury to our fiscal responsibility and to our general Government responsibilities, I would gladly vote for this amendment. But I do not believe that, under present conditions, in view of the already heavy burden of expenditures that our Government is carrying, we can with prudence sustain an additional $12 billion loss in revenue at this time.

So I think it would be unwise to vote for a $1,000 personal exemption at this time. I think it would be unwise to do that because I think such a loss in revenue would place an undue strain on our fiscal position, one that might well cause heavy deficits that would feed the flames of inflation. Thus, the ultimate result of such action, the benefit we would undertake to bestow, would be consumed in those flames of increased inflation.

However, I do feel some relief in this area is imperative at this time and I think that we should seek a middle ground. While I have said I would like to support a personal exemption of up to the amount of $1,000, I feel, as I have just stated, in good conscience I cannot go that high.

My own judgment is that if I were to write the ticket at this moment, I would write it for $750. That would give a family of four a $3,000 exemption, not that we should not keep trying to do more because we should, but I do not believe we can go much higher than that until we can do one of two things or both: Either reduce governmental expenditures or increase revenues, or do enough of both to get our fiscal situation in a more comfortable balance. I think this should be done at the earliest possible time that circumstances permit, but until we can do that, I do not feel we can do as much in this area as I would like to do.

I would say increase the present $600 personal exemption to $750; in fact, I would be willing to vote today for an increase of up to $800. That is as high as I feel I could go. I would like to see it more, but if we can increase it to $750 or $800, we will have taken a pretty long step in the right direction, and I wish that step could be longer. I wish we could raise it more, but I do not feel we can do so at this time.

Mr. President, I see the author of the pending amendment in the Chamber. He was not here when I began my remarks. I wish to take this opportunity to compliment the Senator for bringing this issue before the Senate. He presented it to the committee and he was not successful there. He has now brought it to the floor of the Senate for the Senate to discuss and pass judgment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall yield but first I would like to conclude my thought.

I say this because back in 1947 when we had the exemption down to $500, we had a tax bill before us and I undertook at that time by amendment to raise the exemption to $750. The next year, 1948, the exemption was raised up to $600, later in 1954, when an effort was made to increase the exemption to $800 I made brief remarks in the Senate in which I referred to my efforts in 1947 to get the exemption increased.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the comments I made in the Senate on March 4, 1954, which appear in the RECORD at pages 2632 and 2633 of that date.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INCREASE PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS AND EXEMPTION FOR DEPENDENTS UNDER INCOME-TAX LAW

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on February 19, last, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], for himself, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], introduced Senate bill 2983, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code so as to increase the personal exemption and the exemption for dependents to $800 for the 1954 taxable year and to $1,000 for succeeding taxable years; to the Committee on Finance.

This bill would increase the personal exemptions and the exemptions for dependents from $600, the present amount of allowable deductions, to $800 for the taxable year 1954. Beginning next year those deductions would be increased to $1,000. Mr. President, I wish to announce my support of that measure.

At the time of introducing that bill, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia said, among other things:

"Whatever we do for corporations and whatever we do for the big business organizations may have an indirect effect on our economy, but what we do in this field, by leaving more take-home pay in the pockets of the workers, will increase the purchasing power, and will stimulate productivity in the United States. If we are courageous enough to take this forward-looking step, before our economy falls on its face, we can be of great service to the American people."

Mr. President, I am sure my announced support of this measure is no surprise to my colleagues in the Senate. Nor will it come as a surprise to the people of my State of Arkansas, whom I have the honor to represent in this distinguished body. I have long advocated this method as the proper way to begin reducing taxes. As early as May 28, 1947, when a tax bill was before the Senate, and at which time these exemptions were only $500, I offered an amendment to increase personal exemptions to $750.

In urging the adoption of that amendment, Mr. President, I said on the floor of the Senate:

"I have said over and over again that I think that is the point where tax relief ought to begin, namely, with people in the low-income brackets, the low-wage earners, the people who are having a struggle to provide the actual necessities of life. * * * Many a man is struggling today to live on a comparatively decent standard. * * * It is obvious that we should start reducing taxes by helping those at the bottom of the ladder who have the hardest struggle."

Notwithstanding my efforts, on a rollcall the amendment was rejected by a vote of 44 to 27.

Again, on July 14 of the same year, feeling so strongly the propriety and necessity for increasing income tax exemptions, but realizing I could not get them increased to $750 as I had originally proposed, I offered an amendment to raise exemptions to $600, the amount they are at present. In addressing the Senate at that time, I said:

"There is no use arguing the amendment. Senators know they are either for it or do not favor it. I know it will be said it would increase the loss of revenue to result from enactment of the bill. Certainly it would. That is what we are doing, proposing to lose revenues, and if we are to lose revenues, and keep on losing them, I want to lose some to the advantage and for relief to wage earners and small-salaried folks who are trying to make a living, who are having a hard struggle to meet the high cost of living. I should like to remove some of them from the Federal tax rolls. They are the ones who need tax relief most. Their tax burden is much greater than any whom this bill is designed to benefit."

The Senate turned down that proposal, but by a vote of only 47 to 43.

Later, on December 12, 1947, I again took the floor in a special session of the Senate to urge the Republican majority of the 80th Congress to acknowledge their responsibility for the enactment of proper tax legislation by providing relief to low-income groups. In that address I said:

"Those are the people, Mr. President, who are really suffering from high taxes. If our Government can stand any loss of revenue—if now is the time to make reduction in income taxes—let us start by including in any tax-reduction bill that we enact, relief for those people who need it most, by raising personal exemptions sufficiently to take them off the tax rolls."

Continuing, I said:

"I hope, Mr. President, that in the next session of the Congress we will enact legislation to raise personal exemptions in order to remove many citizens from the tax rolls and help others in the low-income brackets who greatly need tax relief."

The issue raised by my amendments in 1947, although they were not adopted, helped to pave the way for the raising of personal exemptions to $600 in the bill that was enacted the following year.

While trying to get personal exemptions increased in 1947, I also sponsored an amendment to remove the flagrant Federal income-tax discrimination that then existed against husbands and wives in Arkansas. Husbands and wives in 12 community-property States paid much less Federal income tax on the same amount of income than husbands and wives of Arkansas were required to pay. Three of those States—Oklahoma, Texas, and Louisiana—border on Arkansas. Thus, citizens of Arkansas were being unjustly penalized and discriminated against.

The first amendment I offered to remove that discrimination was defeated by a vote of 51 to 29. Later in the same session I offered the amendment again, and it was defeated by a vote of 52 to 40; but, it was not defeated until promises were given by the leadership of both the majority and the minority that the amendment I was sponsoring would be incorporated in the next tax bill, which came up the following year. That promise was kept, and in 1948 the principle of putting husbands and wives of all States of the Union on the same basis with respect to Federal income taxes was passed.

I may say that up to now it has resulted in the elimination of a discrimination which has amounted to approximately $40 million to the husbands and wives of Arkansas, as compared with the 3 States on its borders.

Mr. President, a general tax-revision bill is presently being developed and processed in the House of Representatives. It has not yet been reported by the Ways and Means Committee, but I think we can anticipate that a tax-revision bill will be passed by the House and sent to the Senate at this session of Congress. If that prospect materializes, then the distinguished Senator from Georgia will have the opportunity to present his bill as an amendment to the tax bill that comes over from the House.

I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury, and the administration opposes raising personal exemptions. The Ways and Means Committee of the House has already rejected the proposal. If the House does not incorporate this provision in the bill it passes and sends to us, then we must make the fight in the Senate and adopt the George amendment.

I say this, Mr. President, because the reductions now indicated by the House Ways and Means Committee are wholly inadequate to give proper tax relief under present economic conditions. They ignore and disregard giving relief where the need is the greatest. That relief can be provided only by the increasing of personal exemptons.

It appears that the revisions now proposed by the House Ways and Means Committee and by this administration would benefit big business and individual taxpayers in the upper-income brackets.

Apparently the philosophy behind this administration's tax-revision program is based upon the so-called "trickle-down" theory—the argument being that tax cuts for big business would stimulate investments and production, resulting in more jobs and more payrolls. This "trickle-down" theory, Mr. President, is not the proper approach for relieving the tax burden where the present greatest distress exists.

The cost of living is today at the highest level in the history of our country. It has risen approximately 12 percent since 1947. If I was right in the position I took then—and I was—in urging that personal exemptions be raised to $750, we are more than justified in insisting now that they be raised to $800.

Instead of providing tax relief, Mr. President, that will "trickle down" to the small-income groups, I want to give them some direct relief by raising their personal exemptions and thus permit them to return more of their wages to meet their own personal expenses and the cost of living. In other words, Mr. President, by raising personal-income exemptions we can create tax relief and benefits that will "trickle up" and bolster our economy by placing more purchasing power in the hands of the consumer. That is to say, if those in lower-income groups are given an increase in personal exemptions they will be able to spend those additional funds, taxes they are now required to pay, for those essentials and necessities of life of which they and their families are now being deprived.

That money spent by them would, of course, find its way into the possession of those in the higher income categories. It always does. Money spent in the normal course of trade by our small-income earners goes for food, clothing, and those basic essentials that make for a higher standard of living. Such expenditures ultimately go back into industry, thereby enabling it to expand, to create more jobs, and to increase production and payrolls.

It is said that the increasing of personal exemptions to $800 as proposed by the Senator from Georgia will cause a loss of revenues of approximately $4 billion. While I doubt that the net loss would be that much, nevertheless, such a program is necessary in the threatening situation if we are to use tax relief for the bolstering of our economy. I am for a sound economy, but I submit that no economy is sound when, by the imposition of a Federal income tax on his meager earnings, the low wage earner is deprived of those essentials that are needed and necessary to provide for him and his family a minimum standard of living.

Mr. President, I wholeheartedly support, as I have in the past, the proposal to raise personal exemptions as a means of providing tax relief to those in the greatest distress, and who are suffering most under the present income tax burden.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, at one time we came very near increasing the exemption. I see the vote was 44 to 27 on the first effort I made to raise the amount to $750 per person; and then, on the second effort I believe the Senate turned me down by a vote of 47 to 43. We got close and thereafter the exemption was finally increased to $600, the present exemption.

At the same time I was fighting for the increase in personal exemptions I initiated the effort that finally culminated in the removal of the discrimination that then existed with respect to married couples in different States of the Union. As a result of my efforts in 1947 on that issue we were promised, in order to defeat the proposal, that it would be incorporated in the next tax bill. That amendment was then defeated by a vote of 52 to 40 but it was not defeated until promises were given by the leadership of both the majority and the minority that the amendment I was sponsoring would be incorporated in the next tax bill. Therefore, it can be seen that I started my efforts in this direction quite a long time ago.

Mr. President, I will yield now to the Senator from Tennessee. I wish to congratulate him for bringing this issue to the floor of the Senate. I cannot go all the way with his proposal. I think there would have to be some restraint due to conditions today. We cannot afford to throw the budget too far out of balance, and I do not see much prospect of raising any additional revenues of any great consequence by this bill. So I think we have to be restrained in this matter.

If the pending amendment does not prevail, I hope the Senator will offer another amendment to bring the amount down. I would like to see it at $750. I think that would be the happy balance or the best balance under all the circumstances. But I will vote to raise the personal exemption as high as $800.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I find great comfort in the position and the eloquent statement of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

In reviewing this issue, I had occasion to read remarks the Senator made in the 1940's. In 1954, as a new Member of the Senate, I was a supporter of his amendment to raise the exemption.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That was an amendment offered by Senator George. I was speaking on the amendment, but it was a followup of the effort I had made earlier, as I remember.

Mr. GORE. As I recall, Senator George actually offered the amendment, but it was the Senator from Arkansas who had been in the forefront in urging that the exemption be raised.

I share the Senator's concern about the budget; but once again, I call attention to the fact that the amendment to raise the personal exemption is offered as a substitute for other tax relief items in the bill which would be revenue losers.

I hope that the amendment to raise the exemption to $1,000 will be adopted; but if it is not, I would surely welcome the support of the Senator from Arkansas if and when a test comes on an exemption of $800.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will give the Senator from Tennessee my support on that, although I think the amendment would have a better chance, and that we could sustain it in conference and come nearer to getting the proposal accepted and enacted, if the amount were $750.

I think $1,000 would not be too much; do not misunderstand me—not at all. But I am dealing with the realities of the situation. I am constrained by conditions that prevail by fact, not by fancy. Surely, we would like to have a higher exemption; but I do not feel it would be wise to try to obtain it at this time for the reasons I have stated. I do believe we can go to $750 or possibly to $800 and not do great damage or injury to the soundness of our fiscal policy.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, all of us would like to vote for some form of tax reduction. The more we could reduce taxes the better we would like it. However, there is one thing we must keep in mind, and that is, the fact that to the extent we reduce taxes at this time we will have to borrow the money to finance it. That is true to the extent of the reductions in the committee bill as well as in the pending amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The Gore amendment would increase the deficit substantially greater than would the committee bill, and we can not afford this added loss in revenue.

Senators should be reminded of tne fact that as of June 30, 1968, about 17 months ago, the national debt stood at $350.7 billion.

One year later, June 30, 1969, it stood at $356.9 billion, or an increase of $6.2 billion in the national debt.

Mr. President, I know that under this phony bookkeeping system the administrations have resorted to in the past 2 years, where we include the accumulation in the trust funds in order to confuse the American people, we are trying to tell them that we have a surplus while we are actually operating with a deficit. The facts are that in the past fiscal year we borrowed $6.2 billion in additional money to finance this imaginary surplus that we are leaving to the American people.

From June 30, 1969, to November 1 of this year, a period of 4 months, the national debt jumped $11 billion.

Between November 1, 1969, and November 20—the most recent date we have—the national debt rose to $369.5 billion, or a jump of about $1.9 billion during the month of November.

I point that out to show that we are running far behind the expenditure level for the first 5 months of this year as compared to the first 5 months of last year. It should be taken into consideration that we always get some increase in the national debt beyond the normal during the first 5 months due to revenue collections falling off in the last half of the year.

Nevertheless, we cannot get away from the fact that our expenditures and our deficits are rising today at a much faster rate than they were in the corresponding period last year.

For example, in the first 4½ months of the last fiscal year our income—that is the deposits—was $69.5 billion.

This year in the same comparable period our deposits were $75.6 billion, or an increase of around $6 billion in income.

On the other hand, our withdrawals or expenditures between July 1, 1969, and November 20, 1969, have jumped from $80 billion in last year's corresponding months to $90 billion this year, which means that the deficit has jumped in the first four and a half months of this fiscal year to $15 billion, or $5 billion more than the rate at which the deficit was rising 1 year ago.

Mr. President, all of us should be aware of the fact that we cannot afford to keep cutting taxes and piling up this deficit without further fanning the fires of inflation.

I also point out that the interest on the national debt today is costing a little over $200 million a month more than it cost in the same month a year ago. That is equivalent to an increase of around $2 billion a year that we will have to pay just on the interest on the national debt. We are borrowing in order to pass on some of the so-called tax reductions.

Mr. President, there are a number of other reasons why the Senate in my opinion should reject the Gore $1,000 personal exemption and standard deduction.

First of all, and by far the most important, it would result in a long-term annual revenue loss of $14.8 billion as compared to the $9 billion of tax relief under the committee's bill. There is no way to justify the additional $5.8 billion of tax relief if we are to be at all concerned with fiscal responsibility. The existing bill already is out of balance over the long run by $2.3 billion, and this $5.8 billion would increase the shortfall of the bill to $8.1 billion.

In recent months we seem to have made a start toward getting inflation under control. We are not quite sure yet but certainly there are a number of economic indicators where the growth pattern has slowed down, which suggests that we are about to get our inflation problem under control. To adopt the Gore plan, however, is to throw this long and difficult effort right out the window. In the fiscal years 1970 and 1971 the Gore plan would result in an additional loss of revenue of $3.4 billion. This involves more revenue loss in this period of time than the amendment which the Senate rejected the other day by a vote of 49 to 28 which would have made the 5-percent surcharge inoperative in the first part of 1970. It seems to me that there can be no question that fiscal responsibility demands that we reject the Gore $1,000 plan.

But even if the Gore plan were to provide for an $800 exemption rather than a $1,000 exemption it still would be nowhere near as desirable as the committee action. The committee met the specific problems of the poor by increasing the minimum standard deduction to $1,100. It met the problems of the middle income group by increasing the ceiling on the standard deduction to $2,000 and the percentage standard deduction to 15 percent. The rest of the relief under the committee action is provided in rate reductions for all taxpayers. The Gore amendment concentrates the tax relief among those taxpayers with very large families. While we certainly must treat the folks with large families fairly, we should not treat other taxpayers unfairly just to give this group an extra large share of the tax reduction.

Concentrating the tax reduction, as he does, Senator GORE's proposal with the $800 exemption gives taxpayers with incomes over $20,000 practically no relief at all. The only exception to this are those with very large families.

The Gore amendment also treats unfairly single persons and childless couples or those with only one child. The Gore amendment, in these categories, would increase tax burdens over the House bill by more than a billion dollars. This is done primarily to give more than a billion dollars of tax relief to married couples with three or more children.

HEW minimum standard of living studies show that the biggest living cost is for the first person. Their studies show that $1,700 at a minimum is required for a single person to maintain a minimum standard of living. A minimum standard of living, however, may be maintained by a married couple with an income level of about $2,300. The study shows that the cost of providing the minimum standard of living of necessities for a dependent tends to rise at the rate of approximately $600 per dependent. Therefore, the fairest thing to do is to provide a tax exempt amount of $1,700 for the taxpayer and a $600 additional exemption for each dependent. That is precisely what the committee bill does.

Mr. President, I might add that if and when we get the budget under control we can then raise the exemptions, and that would be a worthy project. Certainly we would all like to do that, but we cannot do it until we get the budget under control.

The Gore amendment, on the other hand, by providing an $800 exemption plus a $1,000 minimum standard deduction provides more relief than is justified for large-sized families.

It is, of course, true that the cost of living per child differs for every family depending upon the family income. This does not mean, however, that whatever someone spends on children should be the amount exempt from tax. An equitable division of total cost of Government requires that these differences be ignored except insofar as exemptions are needed to provide the minimum standard for necessities. This the committee bill does with great precision.

The Gore plan is also unfortunate because it removes the benefit of the major simplification effort made in the committee bill.

The committee bill not only provides a minimum standard deduction of $1,100; it also raises the standard deduction from a maximum of $1,000 to $2,000 and from 10 to 15 percent of adjusted gross income. These are very significant changes and are very important means of simplfying our tax structure for millions of Americans. The committee bill, in fact, should switch 11.6 million people from itemized deductions to the standard deduction and increase the percentage of taxpayers using the standard deduction from 58 percent to 74 percent. This change alone will do more than anything else to simplify the income tax structure for the great bulk of our citizens.

On the other hand, the Gore amendment would only cause some 4.4 million persons to shift over from itemized deductions to the standard deduction. Even this is not caused by the proposed exemption increase but only by the fact that the amendment borrows from the committee plan most, although not quite all, of its minimum standard deduction.

I urge the Senate to reject the Gore amendment, first because it gives away far more in tax relief than our fiscal situation permits. We cannot afford the $5.8 billion of extra tax reduction provided by his amendment. I believe that this alone would cause a veto of the bill and make us lose all of our efforts toward achieving tax reform.

Second, the Gore amendment is unfair because in order to provide greater tax relief for those with large families it robs the single people and married couples with only one or no children of their fair share of the tax relief.

Third, the Gore amendment is unfair because it takes away virtually all of what little tax reduction is provided for those above $20,000 and piles it on top of already large tax reductions for those at lower income levels. The committee's bill provides a 66-percent tax reduction for those in the zero to $3,000 class and a 30-percent reduction for those in the $3,000 to $5,000 class. I should think that this would generally be considered adequate. I cannot see why or how one justifies increasing this still further.

Fourth, in order to find the money for this exemption increase Senator GORE has to scrap one of the most essential characteristics of this bill; namely, the shift for some 11.6 million taxpayers from having to itemize their deductions to taking the simple standard deduction each year.

I urge Senators to reject the Gore amendment at either the $1,000 level or the $800 level.

Mr. President, at this point I wish to read into the RECORD the letter, dated December 1, 1969, signed by the President, as addressed to the minority leader, the Honorable HUGH SCOTT, wherein he strongly recommends that the Senate stand by the committee bill and reject the Gore amendment.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 1, 1969.

DEAR HUGH: The Senate is to be commended for the deliberate speed with which it is considering H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969. I hope that meaningful and acceptable legislation can be passed by Congress before the end of this year. But to be acceptable, such legislation must be equitable and it must meet the test of fiscal responsibility.

Certain amendments scheduled to be considered by the Senate this week fail these tests. I refer to the proposals to raise the personal exemption from $600 to either $800 or $1,000, and to establish a $1,000 uniform standard deduction. Those proposals would be substituted for the major tax-relief provisions of H.R. 13270 as voted by the Senate Finance Committee.

The Finance Committee bill would result in a net revenue gain for fiscal years 1970 and 1971, and a minor loss in 1972. It is consistent with our determined efforts to control inflation.

This bill fights inflation by extending the income tax surcharge at 5 percent until mid-1970; postponing scheduled reductions in certain excises; and repealing the 7-percent investment credit. It is simply not in the national interest then to add new inflationary pressures through reduction in personal income taxes which are too early and too generous.

The proposed amendments would substitute imbalanced, inequitable relief for the Committee's evenhanded tax rate reductions in all income brackets.

The proposal to raise the personal exemption to $1,000 would fall some $6 billion short of the Committee bill during the next 2½ years. The $800 exemption would result in a $4.8 billion short-fall. The Administration's economical Low Income Allowance, which would take some 5 million citizens off the tax rolls and lower taxes on 7 million others, goes far enough this time.

The spirit of this legislation is tax reform which attempts to make taxation fairer to all Americans not tax reduction. It would be unfortunate indeed if Congress violated this spirit of reform and thereby jeopardized both the source of revenue for vital national goals and the fight against inflation.

This Administration is strongly committed to tax reform. I have stated that I will sign a good tax reform bill. I still intend to do so, but it must be equitably constructed and it must be fiscally responsible.

I urge the Senate to accept the tax relief provisions so carefully constructed by the Senate Finance Committee.

Sincerely,

RICHARD NIXON.

In addition, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be incorporated in the RECORD statistics compiled by the Joint Committee on Taxation which show that if a 100-percent tax were imposed on all incomes in America in excess of $50,000 the additional revenue would amount to only $1.1 billion.

There being no objection the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION,
Washington, D. C., September 8, 1969.

Hon. JOHN J. WILLIAMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: This is in reference to your request for an estimate of the revenue gain which would result from applying a tax rate of 100 percent to that portion of each tax return's taxable income which is in excess of $50,000 ($100,000 for joint returns).

We estimate that under present law (without tax surcharge) at 1969 income levels, if a tax bracket rate of 100 percent were applicable to that portion of each tax return's taxable income which is in excess of $50,000 ($100,000 for joint returns), the resulting revenue gain would amount to $1.1 billion, as follows:

[In billions]

Portion of every return's taxable income which is over $50,000	$3.3
Tax at present law rates (without surcharge)	2.2

If net long-term capital gains subject to the alternative 50 percent rate falling in the bracket level in excess of $50,000 ($100,000 for joint returns) were also subjected to a 100 percent rate an additional revenue gain of $1.75 billion would result, as follows:

[In billions]

Portion of every return's net long-term capital gain (subject to alternative tax) which falls in the bracket level over $50,000	$3.50
Tax at present law rate (without surcharge)	1.75
Additional tax	1.75

Sincerely yours,

LAURENCE N. WOODWORTH.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I put those figures in the RECORD in order to do away with the argument that the way to reduce taxes is just to put more taxes on the so-called rich and thereby pass a tax relief on to those in the lower brackets. This table emphasizes the fact that we have already gone far down the road to confiscating the wealth of the so-called rich. I think the table should be included in the RECORD, and I hope Senators will read it carefully.

It should be pointed out that even if Congress should impose this 100 percent tax on incomes in excess of $50,000 the revenue of $1.1 billion is only possible on the unrealistic assumption that all those earning this amount would work just as hard for the honor of turning all their income over to the Government.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the amendment introduced by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, of which I am a cosponsor, to increase the personal exemption from $600 to $1,000 is, in my opinion, the most needed tax relief in America. This is not the first time that I have supported a measure to increase the personal exemption. For over 12 years I have worked for such an increase. Three times I have been elected to the U.S. Senate. Each time that was a prime matter in my platform. No other matter has moved the American people, in my opinion, more than this desire for tax relief.

At the beginning of this Congress, I introduced a bill, S. 1717, which would have increased the personal exemption from $600 to $1,200. When the House passed its tax bill, I reintroduced my bill as an amendment to that bill. Throughout my fight for this increase, the distinguished Senator from Tennessee was an invaluable ally. When I testified for this tax relief before the Finance Committee a few weeks ago, the distinguished Senator from Tennessee said that he would offer such an amendment on the floor of the Senate. I have the privilege of being a cosponsor. He has done so with his usual fine ability, comprehension of the needs of the people, and understanding of legislation. I commend him for his efforts to increase the personal exemption in the Finance Committee. I applaud him for his leadership in bringing this amendment to the floor of the Senate for action.

The tax bill now before the Senate had its genesis with the discontent of the people with the unjust and inequitable system of taxation which forces the major portion of the Nation's tax burden on the lower- and middle-income groups, and lets the richest off with the lightest burdens. These people have demanded that their elected representatives in Congress reform our tax laws and provide relief to the overtaxed segment of our society. Unfortunately, neither the House nor the Senate Committee on Finance included in their tax proposals the one measure that means the most to the average taxpayer: an increase in the personal exemption.

Let me repeat, Mr. President: That means most of the average taxpayers in America; and that means about 90 to 95 percent of the people—the people in the middle-income tax brackets, upper middle-income, lower middle-income, and the workers in the lower income brackets also. Without an increase in the personal exemption, no tax reform will be complete.

The personal exemption of $600 per person was established by the Revenue Act of 1948. During its 21-year history, the personal exemption has not been increased despite the fact that the cost of living, according to the consumer price indexes, has risen by 52.3 percent since 1948. Under present economic conditions, the $600 amount would have to be increased to $914 merely to equal the purchasing power of the personal exemption in 1948. That would be at the level of the standard of living of 1948, but if we increase the amount of the personal exemption to equal the higher standard of living people have now over 1948, it would require an increase in the personal exemption to $1,200 per person per year. But if we were to increase it to only match the increased cost of the same objects that were bought in 1948, without allowing for the higher standard of living, we would have to increase it to $914.

The personal exemption is intended to accomplish three basic purposes: First, to exclude from taxation those individuals and families with the lowest income; second, to provide all taxpayers with a deduction from otherwise taxable income for essential living expenses; and third, to provide an additional allowance to those taxpayers with dependents and for those who are aged and blind. I submit that at the present unrealistic amount of $600, the personal exemption is not fulfilling any of these purposes.

The amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee and the other cosponsors is a well reasoned and progressive approach to remedying many of the inequities in the present tax laws and bringing tangible tax relief to a majority of our citizens. This amendment not only increases the personal exemption; it also provides a $1,000 low-income allowance. The combined effect of the increase in the personal exemption and the low-income allowance will be to provide more direct tax relief to the lower and middle-income taxpayer than does the Finance Committee's version of H.R. 13270.

The Gore amendment, which I am cosponsoring, would raise the personal exemption to $700 in 1970, $800 in 1971, $900 in 1972, and to $1,000 in 1973 and subsequent years. This stair-step increase completely answers the argument that a personal exemption increase would disrupt the tax structure. The 4-year spread-out would help taxpayers to some extent each year, but would do it in such a span of time as to allow increased employment, income, and production to put other taxes in the Treasury. This amendment gives needed tax relief to the most needy, and is fiscally and governmentally sound at the same time, by spreading that increase over a 4-year period.

I am proud to be a cosponsor of this important amendment. It is a measure which is based on strong economic and moral considerations. I have long advocated it. I am devoted to its objectives. I am committed to seeing it adopted. I plead with Senators to give it their most careful consideration and full support.

AMENDMENT NO. 332 TO PERMIT TAX EXEMPT FOUNDATION FUNDS TO BE USED FOR NONPARTISAN VOTER EDUCATION AND REGISTRATION

Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished minority leader, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) and myself, and approximately 30 other Senators whose names I shall read, I send to the desk an amendment to the tax bill, H.R. 13270, and ask that the amendment be printed. The amendment would permit tax exempt foundation funds to be used for nonpartisan voter registration and education programs within certain limitations.

In 1965, Congress took a major step toward fulfilling the American dream of having a society in which all our citizens can participate fully by enacting the Voting Rights Act. This act embodies the belief of Congress and of the majority of our people that the right to vote is fundamental to our democracy and should be extended to all our people. Important as the Voting Rights Act is, it standing alone will not assure full participation in our Government, because it is an axiom of political science, Mr. President, that people who have been disfranchised for many years will not, of their own volition, begin to participate in their government unless they are encouraged to do so.

For the Voting Rights Act to be more than a scrap of paper, it is imperative that those members and groups that have been denied the right to vote for so long be educated as to their rights and encouraged to exercise them. The task of voter education and registration has been left largely to private organizations.

Private organizations have responded to the challenge and their hard work is reflected in the increased voter registration throughout the country.

Two organizations which have been particularly effective in increasing interest in voting have been the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council. These two well-respected organizations have conducted nonpartisan voter education projects throughout the country which have been designed to encourage people to take part in their government by voting their convictions. Neither of these organizations have attempted to stimulate interest in a particular party, nor have they tried to elect a particular candidate or champion a particular cause or political party. On the contrary, what they have tried to do is persuade people of all political philosophies and beliefs that our democracy will respond to the desires and wishes of our people if only they will take the time to vote. Their efforts have met with success. For example, between 1966 and 1968, the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council has added 700,000 people to the registration rolls. Many of these people are members of minority groups which have for years been systematically denied the right to vote despite clear language of the Constitution.

Unfortunately, in some isolated instances, private foundations have abused the privilege granted them under our present tax laws and have engaged in partisan political activities. Such activities must be stopped. The House of Representatives attempted to deal with this problem by including provisions in its version of the tax bill that would permit private foundations to engage in voter registration and education projects provided that these projects are nonpartisan in nature, operate in five or more States, supported by five or more private foundations, and the contributions to the organization conducting such projects are not geographically limited as to use. Although the House provision would eliminate the abuses that have occurred under the present law, these provisions are too restrictive and would eliminate too many voter programs of many of the smaller nonpartisan private foundations.

Instead of trying to improve the provisions of the House bill, the Committee on Finance took what I believe to be an ill-advised and unnecessary step of banning all foundation grants to voter registration and education projects. If this decision is not reversed, much of the good work accomplished by the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Council as well as many of the smaller organizations will be destroyed. Furthermore, to eliminate the means of educating and registering of voters without proposing a workable substitute will seriously undermine the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

The amendment which the distinguished minority leader of the Senate, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT), and I are submitting today is designed to accomplish two specific purposes: First, to curb the abuses that exist under present law, and second, to restore the opportunity to private foundations to support nonpartisan voter registration and education projects. More specifically the amendment would allow foundation participation in such programs provided: First, these activities are truly nonpartisan; second, they are conducted in more than one State; third, they are supported by contributions from the general public or from three or more tax exempt organizations; fourth, no one tax exempt organization contributes more than 40 percent to these activities; and fifth, contributions to such activities are not specifically designated for use in a particular geographical area or specific election.

In short, the amendment will encourage legitimate voter activities while stopping abuses.

It is sad that in the United States, the greatest democracy in history, voter participation is so low. In this country only 70 percent of the eligible voters participate in our Government by voting, whereas in Great Britain 77 percent participate, and 80 percent participate in West Germany. It is the duty of Congress to encourage, not discourage, full participation in our democratic processes. Toward that goal, Congress has made significant progress since 1965. If, however, the tax bill is passed in its present form, this progressive trend will be reversed.

During my years in both public and private life, I have seen the effects of the poll tax and literacy tests on the democratic process. I have seen how for years large portions of our society have been taxed and drafted into military service, but denied the basic right to vote.

Mr. President, on Monday of last week, 8 days ago, for the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I was conducting a hearing on the health problems of Mexican Americans in my State. Some of the Mexican American leaders stated that their people were unable to obtain medicare, they were unable to get welfare, and they were unable to get social security; that they did not understand the language and therefore had great difficulty obtaining these benefits. These leaders, however, did say:

> The government can always find us when they need us for the military draft or for the labor force, but they can't find us for our social security or welfare or medicare payments when we need the government.

When it needs men for the draft, the Government never has any trouble in finding the minority groups of our Nation; however, if these same people want any Government services, or need help in the form of welfare, social security, or medicare payments, the Government cannot seem to find them.

So vast numbers are not on the voter rolls and are not receiving social security or medicare. These people need to vote. They need to be assured the right to vote.

I have seen the good work of private foundations in voter registration and the positive impact of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. Therefore, I urge all Senators to give the amendment careful consideration and respectfully request that they vote for it.

Mr. President, I read for the RECORD the names of Senators who are cosponsoring the amendment. They are: Senators HARRIS, HARTKE, MONDALE, JACKSON, HUGHES, CHURCH, METCALF, INOUYE, HART, YOUNG of Ohio, CRANSTON, MCGOVERN, TYDINGS, BAYH, PROXMIRE, RIBICOFF, MUSKIE, MCINTYRE, EAGLETON, MCCARTHY, NELSON, PELL, GRAVEL, FULBRIGHT, and MCGEE. We have as cosponsors of the amendment on the other side of the aisle Senators SCOTT, CASE, BROOKE, GOODELL, JAVITS, PERCY, COOK, and SCHWEIKER.

I have been away from my office at a conference between the House and Senate on the legislative appropriations bill since well before 3 o'clock. There may be the names of other cosponsors to add to the list before the day is over.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Finance, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of the amendment together with the distinguished minority leader and the distinguished Senator from Texas.

I took the same position in committee. I was sorry that we were not able to prevail at that time.

I am very much impressed by the number of cosponsors of the amendment. I think it heralds well for its chances of adoption in the Senate.

It is rather strange to me that whereas in most Latin American countries if a person is able to read and write, he is required to vote; in our country, where we pay tribute rightly to the democratic ideals, we place all sorts of barriers in the way of people who want to vote.

I think that adoption of the amendment will allow us to continue to lower some of the unreasonable barriers. I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Again, I point out that I am pleased to laud the two principal sponsors of the amendment. I think their stature and support of the amendment will also be very helpful as it is considered by the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Texas for his clear exposition of an amendment which has such wide sponsorship and is clearly designed to make possible the important efforts of some well recognized civic organizations in encouraging the registration of more people to vote, the exercise of the franchise obviously being one of the most precious essentials of our rights in our society. There is a desire on the part of most Americans at this time to vote.

Mr. President, I welcome this opportunity to join as the primary cosponsor of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) to reinstate in the Senate version of H.R. 13270, the tax reform bill now before us, provisions which would permit tax-exempt foundation funds to be used for voter registration and education programs. I am pleased to note that this effort has a broad base of support in the cosponsorship of Senators from both sides of the aisle.

Mr. President, our amendment is addressed to the action taken by the Committee on Finance in totally deleting from the tax reform bill provisions which would permit private foundation funds to be used for voter registration activities. This action, in my opinion, was far more severe than justified or necessary. It complicated further the action taken earlier by the House of Representatives in approving restrictions which, in attempting to correct a few abuses, would have the practical effect of terminating the participation of many well recognized nonpartisan foundations in programs of this kind.

Our amendment, Mr. President, is not without its safeguards; its conditions for eligibility are explicit. It requires that voter registration activities be of a truly nonpartisan nature; that they be conducted in more than one State; that they be supported by contributions from the general public or from three or more tax-exempt organizations, and that no one tax-exempt organization contribute more than 40 percent to any given voter registration effort. Further, our amendment requires continuity by prohibiting the specific designation of tax-exempt funds for use in a particular geographical area or specific election. In short, our amendment, while broad enough to encourage legitimate voter registration and education, is drawn tightly enough to discourage a repetition of those few isolated instances in which foundations have misused the exemption granted them under our present tax laws by engaging in partisan political activities.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is deeply concerned by the potential impact which the Senate version of the tax reform bill would have in this area, if enacted without amendment. The Commission, while urging a more active Federal role, has officially recognized also that the right to vote will not be realized fully unless the burden of taking affirmative action to encourage voter registration is shared with the Federal Government by others. Two private organizations which come readily to mind for their success in nonpartisan efforts in voter registration and education are the League of Women Voters and the Southern Regional Conference. There are others, perhaps less well known, but equally deserving of public recognition and confidence. Unfortunately, the Senate bill not only fails to recognize the need for voter education programs of this kind, but it undermines totally private foundation efforts directed at stimulating voter participation. Our amendment is designed to continue, with adequate safeguards, the tax stimulus needed to encourage and make possible this support.

As one of its strong proponents, I am encouraged by the progress which has been realized to date under the Voting Rights Act of 1965. This act embodies the belief of Congress, a belief shared by a clear majority of Americans, that the right to vote is fundamental to our democracy and should be extended to all of our people. I hope to see the Voting Rights Act further strengthened by extension in this Congress, and I intend to lend fully my support.

But as important as this act is, it cannot, by itself, assure full participation for all Americans in the governmental process. For this goal finally to be achieved, those citizens, who have been denied the voting right that the rest of us take for granted, must be educated about this right and encouraged to exercise it.

Private organizations have responded well to this challenge, and their hard work is reflected in increased voter registration throughout the country. Only today, for example, the Bureau of the Census has reported that the number of Negroes in Southern States who voted in the presidential election last year increased to 51 percent, compared with 44 percent for the presidential election of 1964. The Bureau's report adds that 61 percent of the South's Negro population was actually registered to vote in 1968. The positive impact of this effort must not be abated, especially when so much remains still to be done, not only in the South, but also in the urban areas of the North and in the rural Southwest.

Therefore, I urge all Members of the Senate to give our amendment their serious consideration and support.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I recognize the attractiveness of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to increase the personal exemption to $1,000. It sounds so easy, so simple, and so understandable to the voters back home just to provide the tax reduction in the form of an exemption increase which none of them can fail to understand. Despite this, there are some things about this exemption proposal that I think one should hear and think about before he casts any vote in favor of an exemption increase.

I want to talk about this plan at two different levels. First, I want to talk about the fiscal aspects. The Senator has offered, so far, the $1,000 personal exemption proposal and the increase in the minimum standard deduction to $1,000. However, we all know that if he is defeated on the $1,000 exemption proposal, if we vote down this proposal, as I certainly think we should, then we can expect further suggestions along the same line. We can expect either the Senator from Tennessee or other Senators to seek to scale down the increased exemption level, perhaps first to $900 and then perhaps to the $800 level.

At the $800 level, the revenue impact would be about the same as it would be in the measure provided by the committee.

The Senator from Tennessee used that approach in the committee, and he has assured us that he will do it again in the event the $1,000 exemption is not agreed to.

Because of the double or triple approach that the Senator is almost sure to use on his proposal, I want to talk first on the basis of the revenue loss which is involved in the proposal before us at this moment. In commenting on this proposal, I will hold my comments largely to the fiscal policy implications.

While I think that by far the most dangerous thing we could do would be to adopt the $1,000 exemption proposal with the tremendous revenue loss involved, yet even the $800 exemption proposal contains some very serious flaws. In fact, if the Senate fully understands how serious these flaws are, I doubt whether it would approve even the $800 exemption.

Let me turn first to the $1,000 exemption. There really is no way to describe this, except as fiscal irresponsibility.

If we have any doubts of its fiscal irresponsibility, let me give you just a few of the numbers. Any exemption increase is expensive. Even a $100 increase in the per capita exemption costs over $3.3 billion annually. Each additional $100 exemption increase costs slightly less since the tax base as the exemptions are raised keeps getting a little smaller. Nonetheless, a $400 increase in exemptions on an annual basis still results in a revenue loss of $12.7 billion.

When this is taken together with the minimum standard deduction increase and the rate adjustment which the Senator's proposal provides for single people, the long-run revenue cost of the tax relief which the Senator would provide is $14.8 billion.

This is $5.8 billion more than the $9 billion of relief provided in the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

The $9 billion of relief provided by the House bill, as reported by the Finance Committee, results in a $2.3 billion long-run deficit. I have some doubt as to whether that deficit should exist, but the Gore amendment increases this deficit for the bill by more than three and one-half times, to a level of $8.1 billion.

Frankly, I do not see how we can justify so large a deficit in this bill. I know that the Senator from Tennessee says that he can find plenty of places to increase revenue by adding this reform and that reform to the bill. But these additional measures are hard to enact. I, too, can find ways by which to increase revenues. In committee, I offered proposals to raise more revenue in various and sundry ways. Those proposals would have raised between $2 billion and $3 billion in the pending bill. However, the amendments were not agreed to.

It seems to me to be totally irresponsible to vote for a tax reduction based upon revenue raising measures which neither the House nor the Senate committee has seen fit to agree to. We cannot justify a tax reduction because we think someone ought to pay more taxes. We can justify a tax reduction because we are successful, as the committee was successful, in providing additional revenue. Only in that way can we justify further tax reductions in the pending bill.

Therefore, I do not see how we can justify the revenue loss in this case by problematical revenues which might be obtained from sundry provisions if the Senate were willingly to vote for these tax increases, but I confidently predict that the Senate will not so vote.

If anyone thought seriously that additional reforms could be added to the bill, it would seem to me that the responsible way to go about it would be first to offer amendments to obtain the additional revenue, and then to undertake to dispense the additional revenue in terms of tax savings to those whom one wanted to benefit. That is how we approached it in the Committee on Finance. We voted to raise as much additional revenue as the majority on the committee was willing to vote to raise. Each Senator voted for tax increases in terms of tightening up loopholes or making various groups pay more taxes, as his conscience dictated. Then we proceeded to dispense tax reduction to the extent that we thought we could do so and be fiscally responsible.

If one wanted to vote for a major tax reduction—that is, beyond what the committee did, beyond the $9 billion tax reduction the committee voted—he ought first to submit a revenue raising proposal in the form of an amendment—and see if he can have it agreed to. He should submit a proposal to raise more taxes by imposing them on somebody, no matter who it may be—the bankers, the lawyers, the doctors, the oil people, the real estate people. If he could raise more money, then he could suggest that we provide further tax reductions.

Senators will recall that when we were discussing the surcharge last week, it was pointed out how an effort had been made, for fiscal years 1970 and 1971 particularly, to build up a surplus insofar as this bill was concerned to help contain inflationary pressure. This amendment, however, has worse implications for fiscal years 1970 and 1971 than a failure to extend the surcharge—an action which this body has already rejected by a vote of 49 to 28, presumably upon the basis that the Government simply cannot afford the revenue loss involved in terminating the surcharge as of January of next year. This amendment would cost us in these 2 years an additional $3.4 billion, as contrasted with the $3.1 billion of revenue that would be lost had Senators not agreed to an extension of the surcharge. The Gore amendment would reduce the surplus provided by this bill by $900 million in fiscal year 1970, from $3.4 billion to $2.5 billion. In fiscal year 1971, however, its impact would be much worse. In that year it could be expected to reduce the $3 billion surplus in this bill to $500 million.

Mr. President, when I talk about a $3 billion surplus in this bill, I am not saying that the Government is going to have any surplus in the budget. All I am saying is that this bill would raise $3 billion more than we would have if we permitted the surtax to expire and the excise taxes to expire and if we failed to repeal the investment tax credit. In other words, on balance the bill will produce $3 billion of taxes that otherwise would not exist; and by levying those taxes, we say that we have a surplus over what we would have if we passed no bill at all. But this does not alter the fact that the Government still projects a deficit, next year, of several billion dollars in its administrative budget, and a further deficit in years to come.

The Committee on Finance, in its consideration of the bill, very carefully rearranged the tax reduction features to improve the fiscal situation in fiscal year 1971. The Gore amendment undoes all of this good work plus a great deal more.

We have been told that the surplus on the unified or consolidated budget basis is $5.9 billion for the fiscal year 1970. The Budget Bureau people tell us that even this surplus is in real jeopardy because increases in mandatory payments under existing law for such things as interest on the public debt, veterans' benefits, and social insurance trust fund payments could well exceed the budgeted amounts by $2 billion. These are automatic increases. Moreover, Congress is seriously considering proposed legislation which would add $5 billion in expenditures to the request already reflected in the budget. When we take into account these difficulties in holding down expenditure levels for fiscal year 1970, it seems to me that it is impossible to justify a further increase in the deficit on the revenue side by $900 million.

The problems in fiscal 1971 are likely to be much worse. The administration has already indicated that expenditures in fiscal 1972 can be expected to go over the $200 billion mark, and the struggle in that year will be to try to come up with a balanced budget. We certainly do not help matters along toward achieving this result if we add a $2.5 billion revenue loss to that picture by this amendment.

We seem to be beginning to win the battle to get inflation under control. Retail or consumer prices are still rising too rapidly, but the rate of increase as shown by other indicators, such as wholesale prices, suggests some slowdown. Just as we are beginning to win our battle with inflation, it seems to me that it would be especially inappropriate for us to refuel the fires of inflation all over again by turning this tax reform bill into a measure for deficit financing.

Let me say just one more word about the $1,000 exemption as such. I think it is clear that the administration is not going to put up with the type of revenue loss represented by this $5.8 billion increase in revenue reductions. To me, this suggests only one thing—a veto of the tax reform bill. This would be a terrible waste of effort and hard work for both the House and the Senate and for a good many people who have worked with us diligently in trying to improve our tax laws. So I urge Senators to vote against the $1,000 exemption if they are at all interested in tax reform.

Let me turn now to what is wrong with the exemption proposal, as I see it, even if the amount proposed were reduced so that it would not cause a loss of any more revenue than the Finance Committee's bill. In other words, what would still be wrong with the exemption proposal if it provided for an increase in exemptions to $800 rather than to $1,000? On this basis, the revenue loss from the proposal, given the $1,000 minimum standard deduction and the rate adjustment for single people, would be about the same as the revenue loss provided in the Finance Committee bill and in the House-passed bill.

But before I deal with the problems under the Gore proposal with exemptions set at $800, let me say just a few words about the Finance Committee proposal.

The committee bill is in no sense a jerry-built plan. The House of Representatives Committee on Ways and Means had more time to work on this matter than did the Senate committee, and after our analyses of the matter we agreed that the approach they took was appropriate. There was a specific decision to take care of a number of problems in the existing tax structure. The objectives of the bill were aimed specifically at these problem areas.

The first objective was to take off the tax rolls all persons at or below poverty levels and to provide some special relief for people whose incomes, though above the poverty levels, were still too close for comfort to the edge of poverty. The committee concluded that it just makes no sense to tax people who do not receive enough to maintain themselves at even a minimum standard of living.

For this reason, the committee bill provides a minimum standard deduction of $1,100. This is available to every married couple that files a joint return and also to every single person who files a separate return. This replaces the minimum standard deduction under present law, which provides an allowance of $300 for the first exemption and $100 for each additional exemption claimed on the tax return.

The purpose of this provision is to be sure that those at or below the poverty level pay no income tax and those immediately above this level receive some special tax relief. The committee provision achieves this objective with real precision, as Senators will see when I show them a chart on this matter. The Senator from Tennessee apparently finds little fault in this provision, since he has adopted it as his own, except that he has set the minimum standard deduction level at $1,000 instead of the $1,100 provided by the committee action, or at a level $100 below that which the committee saw fit to provide for those in poverty.

The second concern of the committee was the increasing complexity of the tax laws for the average taxpayer. I am not referring to the taxpayer who is involved in complex business operations or who has an accountant to keep track of his activities for him; rather I am referring to the average taxpayer who at one time took the standard deduction but who now must itemize his deductions because, given the present levels of interest, taxes, medical costs, and prices, the standard deduction has become inadequate for him. At one time in 1944, 92 percent of our taxpayers used the standard deduction. But year by year, this number has shrunk as prices have risen, until today only 58 percent of all taxpayers use the standard deduction.

Mr. President, imagine how much more the reduction in the use of the standard deduction has caused taxpayers to resent the complexity of their tax system. In 1944 82 percent of our taxpayers used the standard deduction. But year by year that number has dropped until today only 58 percent of all taxpayers use the standard deduction.

The bill proposed by the committee would cause a much greater percentage of all taxpayers—approximately 74 percent—to use the standard deduction, and they will feel much better satisfied with our tax system when they are able to do so.

If there is to be a revolt on the part of taxpayers because of complexity, I do not believe it will be because of those who have accountants and lawyers to help them prepare their returns, but rather because the average taxpayer finds that his tax return is too complicated for him to prepare by himself.

The person who has to hire accountants and who has to seek advice and keep records and itemizations just so he can fill out his tax return is the person who is more likely to revolt than the person who already has his accountants, lawyers, and records but who must pay $10, $15, or even $50 more in taxes because of the bill. It is the thought of having to keep records and make itemizations or having the Treasury people call him in that is more likely to cause a person to resent our tax system than anything else.

The bill as reported by the Finance Committee takes dead aim at this problem in two different ways. First, it raises the percentage of the standard deduction from 10 to 15 percent of income; and second, it raises the maximum from $1,000 to $2,000. The effect, in conjunction with the increase in the minimum standard deduction, is to switch 11.6 million taxpayers over from itemized deductions to the standard deduction. This will increase from 58 to 74 percent the percentage of all of our taxpayers using the standard deduction.

The Gore amendment, on the other hand, has relatively little impact in shifting people over from the itemized deductions to the standard deduction as the exemption increase itself has virtually no effect in this direction. The only reason there is any shift at all over to the standard deduction under his proposal is because he accepts the minimum standard deduction from the committee bill, although reducing it to $1,000. This will cause 4.4 million to shift over to the standard deduction as contrasted to the 11.6 million under the committee action. As a result, the exemption increase part of the Gore proposal does nothing to help simplify the tax return for those who continue to pay taxes. To me, this is a major failing of the Gore amendment. It is in marked contrast with the considerable achievements of the Finance Committee bill in this area.

It is true that the Gore amendment takes more people off the tax rolls, as such, than does the committee action, but I will show Senators in just a moment that it is not good to take people off the tax rolls when they really still have a taxpaying capacity.

The third objective of the Finance Committee action, after meeting the special problems of the poor and the need for tax simplification, was to make the remaining relief available to everyone on an across-the-board basis. It is for this reason that the committee provided an across-the-board rate cut for everyone of approximately 5 percent. It is important to realize that this across-the-board cut is available for everyone and is in addition to the reductions resulting from the minimum standard deduction and the increase in the ceiling and rate of the regular standard deduction. This means that those in the lowest and middle-income brackets who are the chief beneficiaries from the minimum standard deduction and the increase in the regular standard deduction get relief in two ways. They get relief not only from the changes in the standard deduction but also in the rate reductions as well. That is why, as I will show you in just a minute, the tax relief provided by the committee action is heavily weighted in favor of the middle- and lower-income brackets.

Let me turn now to a comparison of the reductions provided by the committee action and by the Gore amendment. I have already pointed out the failure of the Gore amendment to achieve the simplification provided by the committee bill. But let us now compare the actual distribution of the tax reductions provided by the two approaches.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the percentage tax reduction by adjusted gross income classes provided by the committee bill and by the Gore plan providing an $800 exemption.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PERCENTAGE TAX REDUCTION UNDER H.R. 13270 WHEN FULLY EFFECTIVE AND UNDER $800 PERSONAL EXEMPTION AND $1,000 LOW-INCOME ALLOWANCE IN PLACE OF H.R. 13270 RELIEF PROVISIONS

Adjusted gross income (thousands)	H.R. 13270	$800 personal exemption and $1,000 low-income allowance
0 to $3,000	−66.1	−72.5
$5,000 to $7,000	−17.0	−22.8
$7,000 to $10,000	−10.9	−16.1
$10,000 to $15,000	−10.3	−10.4
$15,000 to $20,000	−8.6	−7.4
$50,000 to $100,000	−4.8	−0.5
$100,000 and over	+2.6	+10.4

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the tax reductions provided by the committee bill start at 66 percent in the zero to $3,000 category. They provide for a reduction of 30.3 percent in the $3,000 to $5,000 category and a reduction of 17 percent in the $5,000 to $7,000 category. From $7,000 to $10,000, the reduction is approximately 11 percent, and from $10,000 to $15,000 it is 10 percent. Above that level, the reduction gradually falls off, until in the category from $50,000 to $100,000 the reduction is only 4.8 percent. Above $100,000, because of the major impact of the tax reform measures in the bill, instead of a reduction there is an increase of 2.6 percent.

Mr. President, that would work in this way. While some people who are paying taxes on all they earn would receive some reduction in the rates and thereby be benefited, those who have enjoyed tax-sheltered income would be paying much more in taxes. Therefore, when one averages the two, he will find there is a tax increase for persons who make more than $100,000. Although some persons in that group receive tax reductions because they receive reductions in the rates, many of those same people will be paying more taxes because of the increase in the capital gains taxes, the decrease in the depletion allowance, the real estate adjustments, and various and sundry other matters.

Let us now compare these tax reductions with those provided by the Gore amendment. First of all, the average reduction provided by the two plans, since they both lose approximately the same amount of money, is the same: both provide for an overall reduction of approximately 10 percent. Also an examination of the percentages will disclose that in the $10,000 to $15,000 income group, the percentage reduction in the two plans is almost exactly the same—10 and a fraction of a percent. I think this is especially worth noting because of the many statements as to how much more the Gore plan will help the middle-income groups than will the committee action. The statistics just do not show that this is true; the reduction is almost identical to the great middle-income category of $10,000 to $15,000. In the area from $15,000 to $50,000 the Gore amendment provides approximately one-third less relief than the committee bill. Above $50,000, the Gore amendment provides virtually no relief at all and above $100,000, instead of resulting in a 2.6-percent tax increase as under the committee bill, the Gore proposal results in a tax increase of over 10 percent. The relief that the committee bill provides in these areas the Gore amendment adds on in the areas below $10,000. Not satisfied with a 66-percent tax reduction in the zero to $3,000 category, the Gore amendment increases it to 72 percent; it also increases the $3,000 to $5,000 cut from 30 to 36 percent and the $5,000 to $7,000 cut from 17 to 23 percent. Frankly, I do not think that the Senator from Tennessee can establish that these additional cuts over and above those provided by the committee bill are needed in these brackets.

Mr. President, I have been talking to you up to this point only from the standpoint of the distribution of the changes we made in the individual income tax. One must realize that we also provided some tax increases—and no reductions—in the corporate area as well. An important part of this, although by no means all, was the repeal of the investment credit. We also did a number of other things such as getting rid of multiple surtax exemptions and revising the tax treatment of banks and companies engaged in natural resources.

I discussed this matter with the Senator from Tennessee a little bit the other day. As I pointed out then, somebody must bear this additional tax burden represented by these corporate income tax changes. This gets us into the question of the incidence of the corporate income tax—or who bears the burden of this tax. Economists are not in agreement as to the extent to which this tax is borne by the shareholders or shifted forward to consumers. Generally, however, I heard it said that somewhere from one-half to three-fourths of the burden was borne by the shareholders. Obviously, I do not know any precise percentage in this case nor does anybody else.

I have assumed, for purposes of illustration, that a portion of the increased taxes on corporations would be borne by the shareholders, which is half way between 50 and 75 percent that the economists tend to gravitate toward. If we average that out, one could expect about 62.5 percent of the corporate tax changes to be borne by the shareholders. The other 37.5 percent would be about what we would expect the corporation to be able to pass forward to those who ultimately consume its products.

On this basis, I have examined the tax burden of individuals by income levels, taking into account both the corporate and the individual income tax changes made by this bill.

On this basis, the percentage reduction is much less since this takes into account $4.9 billion of corporate income tax increases. The overall tax reduction under the committee bill on this basis is only 2.1 percent. The important thing, however, is the distribution of the tax burden, taking into account the reduction on this basis. I have such a distribution based upon the House-passed bill which is quite close to the Finance Committee action. This indicates a tax reduction of 16.5 percent for those in the zero to $3,000 bracket, a decrease of 14.4 percent for those in the $3,000 to $5,000 bracket, and a decrease of 8.1 percent for those in the $5,000 to $7,000 bracket. For those in the $7,000 to $15,000 bracket, the rate reduction on this basis is 4.5 percent. In the $15,000 to $20,000 bracket, the reduction on this basis is only 2.7 percent, and above that level we are faced with only tax increases—tax increases which amount to 9.1 percent for income levels of $100,000 and over and even in the $50,000 to $100,000 category an increase of 1.5 percent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the distribution of tax reductions, taking into account the tax increase imposed with respect to corporations based upon the assumption that 62.5 percent of the increase is borne by the shareholders.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Distribution of tax reductions under House-passed tax reform bill (Assuming 62.5 percent of the burden of increases in corporate taxes under reform provisions is borne by shareholders)

[In thousands of dollars]

Adjusted gross income:
3 to 5	−14.4
7 to 10	− 4.5

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, these data, mind you, are based upon the House distribution of the burden which also approximates the Finance Committee distribution.

Mr. President, if the bill is to be amended as suggested by the Gore amendment, I have another table I should like to offer for the RECORD, to show how the tax reduction falls when one looks at who is actually bearing the incidence of the increase in corporation taxes. I ask unanimous consent to have this table printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Distribution of tax changes from House-passed reform measures and Gore $800 exemption proposal (Assuming 62.5 percent of the burden of increases in the corporate tax is borne by shareholders)

Adjusted gross income class:	Percentage tax change [1]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what this points out is that the zero to $3,000 income bracket would receive a 19-percent tax cut and the cut would gradually be reduced until those in the $100,000 or over bracket would have a tax increase of 13.4 percent. So that the tax increase is very substantial in the Gore amendment on those with incomes of $100,000 or more. Not a tax cut, but a tax increase. It is a much bigger tax increase in reality than it looks like when we fail to take into account the increase in taxes on corporations.

In other words, rather than being about a 2.4-percent increase in taxes on people with incomes over $100,000, the pending bill, taking into account the corporate increases, provides a 9-percent increase in taxes for people with incomes over $100,000. It would be a 13.4-percent increase on those people with incomes over $100,000 under the Gore amendment, again taking into account the corporate increases. Furthermore, the Gore amendment would impose a tax increase of 1.7 percent on people with incomes between $20,000 and $50,000, and an increase of 4.4 percent on taxpayers with incomes between $50,000 and $100,000.

My main concern with the taxpayers in the higher brackets is what we are doing with their incentive to work, to produce and to create. I think it is important that we should seek to provide justice among all taxpayers at all income levels and that we provide the most incentive to our economy so that we can do the maximum good for all. We need to think in terms of employment and in terms of overall earnings of people, including their standard of living. I think it is important that the tax system provide enough encouragement to someone starting out a new endeavor so that he will really be interested in doing this. It is this which enables a low-income man to move up the income scale, to move up from a job paying, perhaps $2.50 an hour, to $5 an hour. This may not be a direct tax reduction for the man at the lower income level, but I can assure you that it is far more important for his own well-being. He is better off if a little bit of this reduction at least goes to the man further up the income scale so he will help try to provide better opportunities for employment for the man at the lower income level. I do not mean to imply by this that most, or even an important part, of the reduction should be provided in this manner. But I do think it is desirable that at least some of the reduction go to those in higher income brackets, particularly in view of the fact that we are reducing the incentives they previously had through the closing of loopholes.

Let me turn now to the distribution of the tax reduction of the Gore amendment and the committee action by family size. I am well aware of the appeal of the Senator's amendment in this area. But I think we tend to forget, when we are talking in terms of an even amount of revenue loss involved between the committee action and the Gore amendment, as is true with his $800 exemption, that for everyone who gains under the Gore amendment in terms of revenue reduction, someone else must lose. Who are these people that lose under the Gore amendment? I think we should take a close look at this group.

Actually, the Gore amendment, in broad general terms, takes more than a billion dollars of tax relief away from single persons, married couples with no children, and married couples with one child; it then gives this amount to married couples with two children—although the amount involved in this case is quite small—but more particularly to married couples with three or more children.

Mr. President, I ask that a table showing this be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Effect of Gore $800 exemption relative to committee amendments

Increases (+) under Gore amendment:
Single persons	+346
Married—no children, Married—1 child	+713
Total	+1,059
Decreases (−) under Gore amendment:
Married—2 children	−232
Married 3 or more children	−1,154

Mr. LONG. Basically, the Gore amendment takes away some $346 million from single persons and some $715 million from married couples with either no children or one child and gives an amount equal to this to married couples with three or more children.

I have on the easel at the back of the Chamber a chart showing the percentage tax increases that the Gore amendment would impose relative to the Finance Committee action for single persons at various income levels. You will note that the highest increases under the Gore proposal are in the $10,000 to $12,500 range, although they are still very high at the $15,000 level as well.

In other words, Senators will see that taxpayers—and this chart refers to single persons—would pay 2.7 percent more in taxes if they are in the $5,000 category; 4.1 percent more if they are in the $7,500 category; 11.7 percent more if they are in the $10,000 bracket; 11.9 percent more if they are in the $12,500 category. They would pay 8.9 percent more if they are in the $15,000 category. They would pay 5.6 percent more if they are in the $17,500 category. They would pay 3.4 percent more if they are in the $20,000 category. They would pay 4.3 percent more if they are in the $25,000 category.

It can well be seen that a single person in the middle-income tax bracket would be discriminated against badly and would be taxed much more under the Gore proposal than he would be under the bill as reported by the committee. That is assuming one is looking at two bills, each involving the same revenue loss, one of which proposes a $800 personal exemption and the other of which proposes the tax relief proposed by the committee, assuming that deductions are 10 percent of income.

The second table on the easel at the back of the Chamber shows the percentage tax increase, relative to the Finance Committee bill, of the Gore amendment in the case of married couples with no children. You will see that the Gore amendment again has a 9-percent tax increase for those with a $12,500 income and a 7.8-percent increase for those at the $10,000 level.

It should be kept in mind that all students of our tax system agree that those who are discriminated against most in this country by our tax laws are single persons, who enjoy few benefits from the income tax laws. But it is those very taxpayers who would lose most heavily under the Gore approach. The second group which would lose most heavily are those taxpayers who are married and have no children.

Again, when we look at the $10,000-to-$15,000 income levels—it is those taxpayers who would fare worst. They would pay 7.8 percent more at the $10,000 level; 9 percent more at the $12,500 level; 6.7 percent more at the $15,000 level; 4.8 percent more at the $17,500 level; 2.9 percent more at the $20,000 level; and 3 percent at the $25,000 level.

So, generally speaking, if we are talking about the kind of people we see every day, if we are talking about the kind of people we see in the Capitol Building, if we are talking about the kind of people we see in our offices every day, the ones who are regarded as being discriminated against most in the whole tax system, they are the ones who suffer most under the Gore approach.

The question naturally arises then what standards should be used in deciding whether it is the single people or the married couples with no children or one child who need tax reductions, or whether most of the tax reduction should be given only to those with three or more children. Let me tell you how the committee made this decision in what I believe is a rational manner.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has, for several years now, been conducting studies to determine minimum subsistence levels. Their study has shown after adjusting their figures to bring them up to current income levels, that it requires $1,735 as a minimum subsistence level for a single person. For a married couple with no children, this figure is set at $2,230. For a married couple with one child, this figure is set at $2,755, and so on. In fact, if Senators will turn to page 258 of the committee report, they will see table 19, which shows the poverty income levels adjusted to current income levels for families of different sizes. The interesting thing that Senators will note from this table is that it costs approximately $600 per family member, after the first member, to provide a minimum standard of living as the number of persons in the family unit increases.

In other words, if we want to be sure to cover the minimum cost-of-living increase, there should be an additional exemption from tax, after the first exemption, of about $600 for each additional exemption claimed on a return. This is not to say that the actual cost of living does not go up by more than $600 per additional family member because, of course, few of us maintain our families, or ourselves for that matter, at the subsistence level.

If you will now look at the third chart at the back of the Chamber, you will see how the committee action matches actual needs as shown by the HEW study of subsistence levels. The lower solid line of stairsteps is the exemption level provided under present law as the number in the family increases. You will see that it varies from one to eight across the bottom of the chart.

The second stairstep line on the chart, the green line indicates the increase in the nontaxable level which occurs under the committee action. Senators will also see a large dot which is close, although not exactly at the same level, in the case of each variation in family size. This large dot represents the subsistence level as determined by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In other words, the committee action in this regard provides almost an exact correlation with these levels, and is the best and only way I know of measuring the relative needs according to the differences in family size. The dotted stairstep line above the two that I have referred to—the red line in dots—is the level provided by the Gore amendment.

Senators will see that as the number in the family increases, the Gore proposal departs farther and farther from the needs of the family unit. In other words, the Gore amendment removes from the taxrolls many individuals who still have taxpaying capacity. His amendment does that by what I would consider to be a greater and heavier emphasis on exemptions for large family units—a heavier emphasis than subsistence levels would indicate, and certainly more than the studies of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare would indicate to be justified.

I certainly do not want to see anyone left on the taxrolls who does not have a minimal standard of living. But inherent in the thinking of the Senator from Tennessee is one consistent fallacy, and that is the assumption that it costs twice as much for two to live together, three times as much for three to live together, four times as much for four to live together, and eight times as much for eight to live together—as it does for one person living singly.

When the Senator from Tennessee first started offering his amendments in the committee, he was offering amendments to increase the personal exemption for all persons. He was not providing—as provided by the House bill and as voted by the Senate committee—an increase in the minimum standard deduction, which is the most efficient use of money that man has yet contrived to provide tax relief in ways that would give the maximum number of dollars of benefit to those in the low-income bracket. An increase in the minimum standard deduction provides a far more efficient way to help the poor with a given amount of money than would an increase in the personal exemption. So the first several times the Senator offered his amendment in the committee, he kept being confronted with the fact that invariably GORE would tax the poor more.

After he had been voted down several times, the Senator came to us with a modification of his amendment as seen here, where he did start out by retaining those things in the House bill and those things in the committee bill which help the poor the most; so that the Senator from Tennessee proceeded on the basis that the minimum standard deduction, as suggested by the committee, would be about the same.

But he still retains the fallacy I mentioned. He still thinks in terms of the same exemption for one person as for each member of a family of two, or a family of three, or four, or five.

The fact is that $1,000 is not enough for one person living alone to subsist on. He needs more than $1,000. He needs $1,735, according to the study that was the basis of this bill. But when he takes a wife, he does not have to have $1,735 multiplied by 2. At that point, he needs only $600 more for the two of them living under the same roof, sharing the same bed, using the same cooking facilities, so that those two people can live as well as that one person could live with $1,735. And when the two have a child, it is estimated they would need about $600 more for the child, so that the three could live on the same standard of living as one person would live if he had only a $1,735 income to support himself.

So, while it is nice to think in terms of providing the same amount of personal exemption for all taxpayers based on need, the fact of the matter is that you need a greater figure than that if it is just one person you are looking at, but you do not need to multiply the same figure to maintain the subsistence level beyond that.

If we proceed on the basis of the fallacy that has been consistent throughout the presentation of the Senator from Tennessee, Senators will see that a large amount of income is removed from the tax base in ways that minimum subsistence levels just do not require. Under the bill that the committee has brought forth, we increase the tax base by making a lot more income subject to taxes. That is what we call the reform part of our bill, and that is the part that takes most of the pages—about 90 percent of them.

Under the committee bill as reported, 5.6 million people would be removed from the tax rolls. But we started with the subsistence levels as determined by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and therefore the committee bill did not provide the much greater reduction in the tax base which would otherwise have occurred.

When you take the tax increases and the increase in the tax base provided by those increases, and then subtract from it the low income allowance and other tax relief measures provided by the committee, the bill before us reduces the tax base on which Americans pay taxes from $370 billion to $350 billion. So the tax base in this bill, as reported by the committee, is narrowed by $20 billion. And, Mr. President, insofar as we tax a $350 billion tax base, instead of a $370 billion tax base, and insofar as we have removed people from the tax rolls, we must put more taxes on those who remain on the rolls.

Let us see what the Gore amendment does. It would further reduce this tax base to $327 billion. That is $23 billion more than the reduction in the committee bill. This additional $23 billion reduction is reflected on that chart by the difference between the higher stairstep line of red dots and that solid green line with a dot in the middle of each stairstep.

Going up to the green stairstep level, we are relying on the studies made in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare regarding the subsistence level that a person requires. By this standard, the Gore amendment would increase exemptions more than that information would otherwise justify.

Insofar as the committee has raised the low-income allowance and taken people off the tax rolls, it has done so by a study of subsistence levels. The Gore amendment proceeds by arbitrarily raising the per capita exemptions to the level that the Senator from Tennessee would prefer: $1,000. And if he cannot get the $1,000, if he follows the same procedure as he did in the committee, he will offer $900, and he said here on the floor he would offer various steps on down if he cannot get that agreed to.

The figure taken by the Senator from Tennessee is a figure calculated to be popular, but it is not a figure based on a study of what people's needs are; it is a figure taken by the Senator as one that would be politically appealing. And well it would be. The difficulty is that the Government cannot afford that loss of revenue. And a further difficulty is that it is a vain thing, in my judgment, to talk about it, because I have no doubt that if this bill, amended in that fashion, reaches the President's desk, the President is going to veto it.

I do not know precisely at what point the President would feel that the Congress has been so irresponsible that he should veto the bill. The President once said that he had in mind some point at which he felt he would be compelled to veto the bill, and for good reasons.

I assume that he is not going to disclose what that point is, because he does not want to dictate what we should do or should not do with respect to a particular amendment. Other Presidents have not done so, and I assume that our President would not say, "If you cause us to lose more than $3 billion in revenue, I will veto the bill."

I do think, however, that every President has some idea at what point he will veto a bill.

I have no doubt that the big revenue loss which would result from the Senator's amendment, even though the amendment may be popular to those who will be removed from the tax rolls, would cause the President to veto the bill. It might be fine for one to say to a constituent, "I have voted to give you a $1,000 tax deduction." However, as a practical matter, there is no doubt in my mind that the President would then veto the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I agree completely with the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana. I do not think that the President would have any choice but to veto the bill in view of the financial situation currently confronting our country.

Mr. LONG. That is how it would seem to me. It involves an enormous revenue loss. It involves a revenue loss of $5.8 billion more than the amount which the committee thought was responsible. It involves a loss of $5.8 billion more than the amount the House thought would be responsible. Frankly, the committee hoped to bring about a bill with more balance than that of the House. Although we did not come quite up to the House balance, we came very close.

We cannot say much for the shape that the bill would be in, however, if we were to agree to the $1,000 amendment or even the $800 proposal. If the amendment retains some of the good features the committee voted for—and the Senator's amendment does contain some of those good features—there would be a very large revenue loss to the Government—a loss so large that we would be irresponsible in adopting it. The only way we could make the bill work out on balance would be to strike out some of the desirable things provided in the bill by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, in addition, if we agree to the Gore amendment and there is the additional revenue loss of almost $6 billion, there is no question that the Government in the present situation would have to borrow the money with which to finance the tax reduction. And the interest on the money the Government would have to borrow would itself cost the taxpayers over $1 million a day in order to give these taxpayers the added tax reductions. It would also add further to the inflation we presently have.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. It would be highly inflationary.

If our Government is going to proceed to enact tax reductions that it cannot afford to enact—it already has a projected deficit of $4.7 billion in the administrative budget next year—and if we are going to decline to do anything to help the Government put its house in order, how can the Government or anyone else call upon the bankers to hold down the interest rates or call upon the businessmen not to increase their prices? That would be a case of every man for himself.

The Government would not have done anything to fulfill its responsibility. And it is hard to see how the Federal Reserve Board could try to restrain the inflationary pressure if we on the Hill, who have the responsibliity for supervising the Board and enacting the laws under which it acts, are not responsible enough to provide the Government with the amount of money it needs to operate and hopefully to achieve a balanced budget.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if the Senator is disturbed about the matter, I have a copy of the letter received from the Secretary of the Treasury commenting on the $800 proposal of the Senator from Tennessee.

It is indicated here that this would shift the burden from the present law or the committee's suggestion so that single persons, married couples with no children, or married couples with one dependent would pay an additional $1.2 billion. Persons with four exemptions would pay an additional $0.2 billion. Persons with five or more exemptions would continue with the tax exemption and would benefit from the amendment.

Perhaps I have a conflicting interest there, having five children. However, does the Senator have the information as to the impact the $1,000 proposal of the Senator from Tennessee would have?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the long-term effect of it would be to unbalance the bill by about $5.8 billion, as compared with the committee's bill. That is what the effect of the pending amendment would be.

The amendment is phased in. The Senator's proposed increase in the personal exemption would not go into effect all at one time.

As I understand it, the amendment the Senator offered would cause the personal exemption to be increased next year from from $600 to $700. Then, in the following year it would go from $700 to $800. In the next year the personal exemption would go from $800 to $900, and in the following year it would go from $900 to $1,000.

While the bill itself entails a long-term revenue loss when in full operation—as I recall, it is about $2.3 billion—this would increase that net revenue loss by $5.8 billion. So we would have more than an $8 billion long-term revenue loss in the bill. The pending bill provides that taxes are to go down in January of 1970, in July of 1970, and then after that by such amounts as we think are responsible.

The Gore proposal puts us away above that in respect to revenue loss each year. Even though it is phased in, it would start out with an increase in the deficit of $900 million next year, and $2.5 billion in the deficit the next year, and so on.

It would continue until it built up, when in full effect, to a revenue loss of $5.8 billion more than the committee's bill.

I would think that one could see how any President looking at that thing in terms of his fiscal problems would have to say, "We cannot afford that much revenue loss now."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, with all due respect for the argument of the Senator about the future, if I were sure that it might be vetoed, it might correct some of the mistakes we made yesterday, as far as I am concerned. That might encourage more of this body to vote for the amendment.

Can the Senator explain it to me in terms of the committee bill? The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury's analysis shows that the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee shifts the burden to the smaller families and single people. Is it true that the committee bill goes the other way and shifts some of the burdens to the larger families?

I seem to think that the Senator has, by the committee proposal, increased the standard deduction, but not given the person who has had a little piece of the action before, the man with more than three children, the same benefits as the others get under the committee bill.

Mr. LONG. No, that is not the case. The man with three children gets the same rate reduction and low-income allowance as everyone else. If he is in the middle-income bracket, where the standard deduction is available to him, he gets the tax reduction resulting from the increase in that, too. In other words, the committee's bill does not shift a portion of the tax burden from smaller families to larger families. It does not vary the amount of tax relief by the size of the family—as the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee would do. The committee's bill provides the additional tax relief equally to taxpayers, whether they have small or large families.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, why did the committee not touch the $600 proposal? It has been in effect since 1948. The standard exemption has not been altered.

If we are for tax reform, why did the committee not suggest some change in this exemption so that the total concept of tax reform could pass on to everyone?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the committee concluded that the minimum standard deduction, which has been developed, is a better device. Given any figure of revenue loss that the Government can stand, it would distribute that revenue loss in ways that are most advantageous to those at the bottom of the taxpaying ladder and would have the least impact on those who are better off up at the top. The minimum standard deduction is a device which makes it possible to reduce the tax of the poor and reduce the tax of the people who are just above the poverty level, without providing any tax relief to the upper income tax brackets where it is less needed. By using that device, one can most efficiently take $1 or $2 billion and give more relief to those at the bottom than he can with the same number of dollars in any other way.

When we were confronted with the possibility of using a minimum standard deduction to help the poor and the near-poor, as an alternative to increasing the personal exemption by $100, it was pointed out that if you increase the personal exemption by $100, the man who is in the 70-percent bracket will get a $70-tax benefit from it, even though he does not need it for living purposes. The fellow in the lowest bracket, the 14-percent tax rate, however, would get only a $14 benefit, and yet this is the fellow who most needs the relief.

It was argued that there was no need at all, if you had only that much tax reduction to grant, to give the tax cut to someone in the upper bracket; that you ought to concentrate in the lower brackets and give it all, not just the $14, but the whole thing, to the fellow at the bottom.

So the minimum standard deduction was worked out to give the advantage to the little fellow at the bottom, without bringing that tax reduction on up the ladder to those people able to pay.

In past years, no one ever discussed that. When I first came to the Senate, no one ever heard of any minimum standard deduction. At that time, it was thought that the most effective way you could help the little fellow at the bottom, if you had $1 billion of revenue to work with, would be to increase the personal exemption. Organized labor came up with the idea of a minimum standard deduction as the most efficient way to take $1 billion, let us say, or any other given figure in terms of dollars, and give the most possible advantage to the poor and the near poor.

It was on that basis that we utilized that device in the 1964 act. This is the tool that President Nixon picked first, saying that if you had only a small amount of revenue loss that could be afforded by the Government—let us say $3 billion—you ought to use the minimum standard deduction approach, or virtually the same thing, which is called the low-income allowance, which would concentrate the tax benefits on the low-income taxpayer, who needed it most.

So, it is true that there was a time when it was thought that the most effective device, in terms of tax reduction, that one could propose to help the poor would be to raise the personal exemption—that was before 1964. But we discovered a device which from 1964 forward has been more effective in taking any given number of dollars and concentrating it for the benefit of the little fellow at the bottom, and that is the minimum standard deduction. Most people do not know about this. They just look at a tax chart and run down a column in one direction to see what their income level is, and in another direction to see what the number of exemptions is; and where the two lines cross on the chart, that is the figure they owe.

The reason why we have been able to distribute tax reductions in ways that most efficiently help the poor is that someone came up with the device of a minimum standard deduction. That is in this bill. The Senator from Tennessee, even though he started out without it, has incorporated that in his proposal, because up until that point he was offering these increases in the personal exemption as an answer to, and a better proposal than, the committee bill; and, without exception, he was running into the fact that GORE would tax the poor more. So eventually he accepted the device recommended by President Nixon, and also by President Johnson, that as a starting point you ought to take a certain number of poor people off the rolls, and the most effective way to do it was the minimum standard deduction. That is what this bill does. We take the most efficient tool that can be used to help the poor and take as many as we can off the tax rolls.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator for his explanation.

I still feel that what is missing from the committee proposal is the equity that is involved by giving the larger families additional exemptions under existing law. I cannot quite see, even assuming this minimum standard deduction, why the exemption itself should not be carried forward as it is today.

Mr. LONG. The level of exempt income for single people is advanced to the extent that their subsistence level has advanced, and they then receive the benefit of the rate reductions beyond the subsistence level. The larger families also receive major tax reductions under this bill. The large families in the category of zero to $3,000 of taxable income share—and they share proportionately—in a 66-percent reduction in their tax liability—a 66-percent tax cut, and that is a big cut, a cut of approximately two-thirds. Many of them come off the tax rolls completely. So they enjoy a great deal of tax reduction. Many of them will come off the tax rolls, along with many single people and married couples.

But the Gore proposal would then proceed, as between these categories, to shift more tax reduction to the larger families at the expense of the smaller families or the single persons. One cannot justify that if it is done on the basis of the amount of money that someone needs to subsist.

Mr. President, this cutting away at our tax base can have serious repercussions for the future. It means that people who do have taxpaying capacity will not be concerned with the amount or purposes of Federal Government expenditures. It means that tax burdens borne by those in the future will be borne by a narrower group of taxpayers, which means higher taxes for those who remain subject to tax.

I realize that we are concerned with the mother pushing the market basket through the grocery store, and I am just as much concerned as anyone else to be sure that we do not overburden her and her family with too much taxes. I am also concerned, however, that we are fair in the tax burden imposed on single people and the married couples either with no children or with one child. They, too, must meet the cost of living and push the market basket through the grocery store. There are about 13.5 million of these single people over 21 in our country, in addition to the 22 million married couples—that means 44 million people—with either no children or one child who also must meet the cost of living.

All I am asking is that we be fair in the distribution of the tax burden as between those with different family sizes. I think we have a responsibility in this regard for all the people in the country and not just limited groups. I believe that the committee action in this regard is the fairer of these proposals, and I urge Senators to vote to retain the committee proposal and to vote to reject the Gore amendment.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, I speak today in support of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which I have joined in sponsoring. This is a matter of the utmost importance to all Americans, but especially to the millions of low- and middle-income taxpayers. Much has been said in this deliberative body about the poor and what should be done to help the poor. In this connection, the debate and our actions are not yet completed; in fact, they will not be until poverty is eliminated in America.

On the other hand, what has been said about the middle-income taxpayer and the tremendous burden placed on his shoulders by an unfair and antiquated tax system? Precious little, I am sorry to say, until very recently and especially in this congressional session. The middle-income taxpayer is by all accounts the forgotten American. He is not making so little income that he is eligible for special compensation benefits, nor is he making so much that he is carefully scrutinized by the Internal Revenue Service or is so rich that he is in the public eye. He pays more than half our individual income taxes, works steadily, goes on a modest vacation annually, if at all, and generally speaking, is the backbone of our American society. Unfortunately, instead of rewarding the many average Americans, we have punished them by not seeking to fairly distribute the income tax burden evenly and according to one's ability to pay.

The now well-known testimony of former Secretary of the Treasury Joseph W. Barr before the Joint Economic Committee early this year brought into clear focus the urgent task of Congress—to reform our tax system and make it more fair, simple, and neutral, and to restore and strengthen public confidence in our tax system. I quote a portion of Mr. Barr's testimony which underscores the need for this Congress to pass far-reaching tax reform legislation this year:

> Our income tax system needs major reforms now, as a matter of importance and urgency. That system essentially depends on an accurate self-assessment by taxpayers. This, in turn, depends on widespread confidence that the tax laws and the tax administration are equitable, and that everyone is paying according to his ability to pay.
> We face now the possibility of a taxpayer revolt if we do not soon make major reforms in our income taxes. The revolt will come not from the poor but from the tens of millions of middle-class families and individuals with incomes of $7,000 to $20,000, whose tax payments now generally are based on the full ordinary rates and who pay over half of our individual income taxes.
> The middle classes are likely to revolt against income taxes not because of the level or amount of the taxes they must pay but because certain provisions of the tax laws unfairly lighten the burdens of others who can afford to pay. People are concerned and indeed angered about the high-income recipients who pay little or no Federal income taxes. For example, the extreme cases are 155 tax returns in 1967 with adjusted gross incomes above $200,000 on which no Federal income taxes were paid, including 21 with incomes above $1,000,000.

But merely recognizing the need for reform is one thing. Proposing and passing legislation to eliminate inequities is another matter. So far the House of Representatives and the Senate Committee on Finance have responded well. It is now encumbent upon the members of the Senate to carry forward the work accomplished thus far. I submit to all assembled here today that we cannot allow the rich to pay little or no taxes while those least able must bear the burden. All Americans must pay their fair share. The 16th amendment to the U.S. Constitution gave Congress "power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever sources derived."

However, the Congress must exercise its responsibilities by making certain that the tax system does not lag behind the times, keeping in mind that although the 16th amendment to the Constitution provided the Congress with the power to lay and collect taxes" it is for Congress continually to review the tax system and insure that a just and fair tax structure prevails. Some may find comfort in rebutting my comments with the allegation that no tax system, after all, is perfect. I take no comfort in that statement. As now constituted, the flaws in our system are so severe, so widespread, that it is a wonder we have not already had an outright tax revolt in America.

Tax reform legislation this year has been legislation that would cut taxes for some and legislation designed to close tax loopholes, enabling tax cuts to become feasible in some areas while at the same time raising revenue to make tax cuts possible in other areas.

The tax reform bill now before the Senate still does not embody what many of us must carefully address ourselves to—a more just and equitable personal exemption on each individual's personal income.

In the past and now on two occasions in this Congress I have introduced bills to increase the personal exemption. S. 1054 and S. 2095, introduced by me this year, include a provision to increase the amount of personal exemption from $600 to $1,000. Today, Senator GORE's amendment, which I have joined in sponsoring, includes portions of the same provisions in my bills. I believe, as Senator GORE and many others do, that the $600 personal exemption, established in 1948, has long ceased to be a fair exemption for millions of middle-income Americans.

Since 1948, the personal exemption has not been increased, while during the same time the cost of living has shot sky high. In fact, since 1948 the Consumer Price Index has risen by about 45 percent—based on average levels of the index in 1948 and 1968—so the $600 figure would have to be raised to, at the very least, $868, merely to equal the purchasing power of the $600 personal exemption adopted more than 20 years ago. Also, what was considered a reasonable standard of living 20 years ago is not so today. Thus, the great majority of taxpayers are taxed at a standard-of-living and cost-of-living index that has become outdated.

Many have said they are opposed to increasing the personal exemption because of loss of revenue to the Federal Government. We can replace any loss of revenue by closing tax loopholes which favor the wealthy people in our country, and by eliminating wasteful Federal expenditures.

The burden placed for years on the millions of average Americans must end this year. The House Ways and Means Committee, under the able chairmanship of Representative WILBUR MILLS, and the Senate Committee on Finance, under the able chairmanship of the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), are to be commended for their tireless and dedicated efforts in the name of tax reform. The provisions are complex, and in some cases the impact of some changes on our society are as yet undetermined.

In the next session and in succeeding sessions of Congress it will be necessary to continue our scrutiny of the tax system, revising and improving upon the work done in this Congress. It is our constitutional and moral responsibility. Today, however, we need to enact tax reform legislation that will improve the system now. Therefore, today I support my colleague, Senator GORE in the amendment to the Tax Reform Act of 1969 to increase the personal exemption to increase the personal exemption to $700 in 1970, $800 in 1971, $900 in 1972, and $1,000 in 1973 and thereafter.

This means there will be sufficient time for the Federal Government to get its treasury in order. The delayed increments will also allow the Federal Government time to obtain additional revenue not before obtained as a result of the passage of the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The $1,000 personal exemption we propose by 1973 will mean a loss of revenue, true. But this loss can be made up by the tax reform measures we are now considering. Also, the additional money available to the taxpayer will result in money being spent by purchasing additional goods and services, or additional investments. This would have the effect of increasing the Government's tax base, and when the war in Vietnam comes to a close may give the economy a much needed shot in the arm.

This amendment should be the very least we can do to demonstrate our awareness and willingness to bring about a truly equitable tax system. Citizens everywhere are enraged by the many inequities that have continued to plague the "little man" while favoring the affluent minority. In my own State I have witnessed the formation of two organizations for tax reform—the New Mexico Taxpayers for Tax Reform and the Taxpayers Association of New Mexico. These and many other similar groups have been formed throughout the country by concerned citizens who do have legitimate complaints. We must respond to them, and one way is by the adoption of this amendment to raise the personal exemption to $1,000.

I remind Senators that at present 2.2 million poverty-level families pay taxes, and countless millions more are taxed heavily, while having to settle for a mere $600 personal exemption, and while billions go untaxed in many other areas. The reform legislation embodied in the bill we are considering today is the most far reaching ever proposed in Congress. It is the year for tax reform, so let us consider that raising the personal exemption will even further strengthen the people's confidence in the tax reform legislation. The tax surcharge, which is now to be extended into 1970, and which some may say should be extended even beyond that, the inflationary trend which plagues the millions of middle- and low-income families, must be met by fiscal and monetary responsibility to be sure. Also, however, it must be met by compassion and sensitivity to the pressing needs of millions of law-abiding American citizens who pay the bulk of our Federal expenditures.

Mr. President, I ask for the support of Senators for this amendment to raise the personal exemption to $1,000. It would go far toward bringing necessary tax relief to those hundreds of thousands in this country who work hard every day of their lives to provide for their families welfare, for their children's education, and who have for far too long shouldered an inequitable share of the tax burden.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, as a candidate for the office of U.S. Senator from Oklahoma, I was frequently approached by citizens of my State who were distressed by the erosion in the purchasing power of the $600 personal income tax exemption. These individuals pointed out the impossibility of meeting even the barest minimum cost-of-living needs with this nominal sum.

Since the establishment of the $600 personal exemption shortly after World War II, the value of our currency has consistently deteriorated. The effect, then, is that the taxpayer has been taxed at a continually rising level, even without a change in the rate of taxation.

Mr. President, statements that an increase in the value of personal exemption to near the 1968 level of purchasing power would cost the Treasury billions of dollars only emphasizes the inequity under which American taxpayers are presently suffering. American taxpayers have already suffered this loss. Taxpayers are being defrauded by the loss of purchasing power of their personal exemptions and it is past time for equity to be restored.

Mr. President, no Member of the Senate is more dedicated to Federal fiscal responsibility than the junior Senator from Oklahoma. This amendment proposes an orderly, step-by-step, $100 per year increase in the exemption through 1973. This adjustment can readily be absorbed without damaging the fiscal integrity of our country.

The complex and confusing changes in the schedule of income taxes in the committee bill does not provide tax relief where it is most needed. Namely, for families with young children to care for and educate. An increase in personal exemptions will provide relief where it is needed. It will easily be understood by the taxpayers and will help to convince them that Congress is alert to their needs."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of amendment No. 304, I wish to associate myself with the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee in support of his substitute amendment.

His arguments favoring increases in personal exemptions and low-income allowances in lieu of lowered tax rates indicate his understanding of the basic motivation of this tax bill. The so-called tax revolt reflects, more than anything else, a public outcry from low- and middle-income Americans for tax relief.

Notwithstanding the equities of other provisions of the pending bill, our primary efforts should be directed toward relieving economic pressures on the people—not things or legal entities—but people. Single persons, husbands and wives, and families desperately need more tax-exempt income in order to survive.

The cost of living has risen more than two and a half times over what it was in 1940. Yet the law provides a personal exemption of only $600 per taxable year—exactly the same exemption as was allowed 21 years ago.

Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee has provided the Senate with a meaningful amendment. He is aware of the cost to the Government in the loss of tax revenues and has suggested many reforms which, if adopted, would recoup the losses and maintain a fiscal balance.

The amendment calls for the addition of $800 to the low income allowance plus a 2-year rise in personal exemptions from the present $600 per person to a total exemption of $800 per person in 1971. That is, $700 in 1970, and $800 in 1971.

Low- and middle-income wage earners would gain the greatest benefit from this amendment. In fact, over 80 percent of the tax benefit would be realized by individuals earning less than $15,000 per year. About 30 percent of the tax relief would be credited to those earning less than $7,000 per year, and to those whose income is between $7,000 and $15,000 annually would go about 50 percent of the tax relief. Thus, the overwhelming majority of American citizens, the backbone of the Nation, would be given by this amendment an immediate relief from the crunch of today's economic pressures.

At the same time, Mr. President, several areas have been enumerated by the author of this amendment where recovery of the tax losses may be realized.

The individual views of the able senior Senator from Tennessee are set forth in the report on the tax bill beginning at page 311. More up-to-date information was given to the Senate by the distinguished Senator on Wednesday, November 26, 1969, and is available to all Members in the RECORD for that date, and again in his opening statement, which appears in yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. President, I commend the Senator for his logical approach to a difficult problem, and for a constructive remedy for a vitally needed tax relief, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed, without amendment, the following bills of the Senate:

S. 564. An act for the relief of Mrs. Irene G. Queja; and

S. 2019. An act for the relief of Dug Foo Wong.

TAX REFORM OF 1969

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a substitute for the pending amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be stated.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) for himself and others proposes an amendment in the nature of a substitute for his amendment No. 304.

(The proposed substitute amendment is as follows:)

Page 454, beginning with line 5, strike out all through page 497, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 801. PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS.

"(a) INCREASE TO $700 FOR 1970.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969, and before January 1, 1971—

"(1) section 151 (relating to allowance of personal exemptions) is amended by striking out '$600' wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof '$700'; and

"(2) section 6013(b)(3)(A) (relating to assessment and collection in case of certain returns of husband and wife) is amended by striking out '$600' wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof '$700', and by striking out '$1,200' wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof '$1,400'.

(b) INCREASE TO $800 FOR 1971 AND SUBSEQUENT YEARS.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1970—

"(1) section 151 (relating to allowance of personal exemptions) is amended by striking out '$700' wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof '$800'; and

"(2) section 6013(b)(3)(A) (relating to assessment and collection in case of certain returns of husband and wife) is amended by striking out '$700' wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof '$800', and by striking out '$1,400' wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof '$1,600'.

"SEC. 802. STANDARD DEDUCTION.

"(a) MINIMUM STANDARD DEDUCTION FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1970.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969, and before January 1, 1971, section 141(c) (relating to the minimum standard deduction) is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) MINIMUM STANDARD DEDUCTION.—The minimum standard deduction is an amount equal to $1,000 ($500, in the case of a separate return by a married individual), reduced, in the case of a taxable year beginning in 1970, by an amount equal to one-fourth of the amount by which—

"'(1) the adjusted gross income for the taxable year, exceeds

"'(2) the sum of—

"'(A) $1,000 ($500, in the case of a separate return by a married individual), plus

"'(B) the amount of each personal exemption provided by section 151 for the taxable year, multiplied by the number of such exemptions for the taxable year'.

"(b) STANDARD DEDUCTION FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING AFTER 1970.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1970, section 141 (relating to the standard deduction) is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 141. STANDARD DEDUCTION.

"'The standard deduction referred to in this title is $1,000 ($500, in the case of a separate return by a married individual)'.

"(c) DETERMINATION OF MARITAL STATUS.—Section 143 (relating to determination of marital status) is amended—

"(1) by striking out 'For purpose of this part—' and inserting in lieu thereof '(a) GENERAL RULE.—For purposes of this part—'; and

"(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(b) CERTAIN MARRIED INDIVIDUALS LIVING APART.—For purposes of this part, if—

"'(1) an individual who is married (within the meaning of subsection (a)) and who files a separate return maintains as his home a household which constitutes for more than one-half of the taxable year the principal place of abode of a dependent (A) who (within the meaning of section 152) is a son, stepson, daughter, or stepdaughter of the individual, and (B) with respect to whom such individual is entitled to a deduction for the taxable year under section 151,

"'(2) such individual furnishes over half of the cost of maintaining such household during the taxable year, and

"'(3) during the entire taxable year such individual's spouse is not a member of such household, such individual shall not be considered as married'.

"(d) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

"(1) Section 4(a) (relating to number of exemptions) is amended to read as follows:

"'(a) NUMBER OF EXEMPTIONS.—For purposes of the tables prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate pursuant to section 3, the term "number of exemptions" means the number of exemptions allowed under section 151 as deductions in computing taxable income'.

"(2) Section 4(c) (relating to married individuals filing separate returns) is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) HUSBAND AND WIFE FILING SEPARATE RETURN.—

"'(1) A husband or wife may not elect to pay the optional tax imposed by section 3 if the tax of the other spouse is determined under section 1 on the basis of taxable income computed without regard to the standard deduction.

"'(2) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, in the case of a husband or wife filing a separate return for a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1971, the tax imposed by section 3 shall be the lesser of the tax shown in—

"'(A) the table prescribed under section 3 applicable in the case of married persons filing separate returns which applies the 10-percent standard deduction, or

"'(B) the table prescribed under section 3 applicable in the case of married persons filing separate returns which applies the minimum standard deduction.

"'(3) The table referred to in paragraph (2)(B) shall not apply in the case of a husband or wife filing a separate return if the tax of the other spouse is determined with regard to the 10-percent standard deduction; except that an individual described in section 141(d)(2) may elect (under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate) to pay the tax shown in the table referred to in paragraph (2)(B) in lieu of the tax shown in the table referred to in paragraph (2)(A). For purposes of this title, an election under the preceding sentence shall be treated as an election made under section 141(d)(2).

"'(4) For purposes of this subsection, determination of marital status shall be made under section 143'."

"(3) Paragraph (4) of section 4(f) is amended to read as follows:

"'(4) For computation of tax by Secretary or his delegate, see section 6014'.

"(4) Section 1304(c)(5) (relating to special rules for income averaging) is amended by striking out 'section 143' and inserting in lieu thereof 'section 143(a)'."

"(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (c) and (d) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

"SEC. 803. TAX RATES FOR SINGLE INDIVIDUALS AND HEADS OF HOUSEHOLD; OPTIONAL TAX.

"(a) HEADS OF HOUSEHOLD.—Section 1(b)(1) (relating to rates of tax on heads of household) is amended to read as follows:

"'(1) RATES OF TAX.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every individual who is a head of a household a tax determined in accordance with the following table:

Over $100,000----	$53,090, plus 70% of excess over $100,000'.

"(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 1(a) (relating to rates of tax on individuals) is amended by striking out so much of such section as precedes the table in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'(a) GENERAL RULES.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every individual (other than a head of a household to whom subsection (b) applies and an unmarried individual to whom subsection (c) applies) a tax determined in accordance with the following table:'.

"(c) OPTIONAL TAX TABLES FOR INDIVIDUALS.—Section 3 (relating to optional tax if adjusted gross income is less than $5,000) is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. OPTIONAL TAX TABLES FOR INDIVIDUALS.

"'In lieu of the tax imposed by section 1, there is hereby imposed for each taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969, on the taxable income of every individual whose adjusted gross income for such year is less than $7,500 (or such higher amount, less than $10,000, as may be prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate by regulations) and who has elected for such year to pay the tax imposed by this section, a tax determined under tables, applicable to such taxable year, which shall be prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. In the tables so prescribed, the amounts of tax shall be computed on the basis of the taxable income computed by taking the standard deduction and on the basis of the rates prescribed by section 1'.

"(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

"(1) Section 6014(a) (relating to election by taxpayer) is amended—

"(A) by striking out '$5,000' in the first sentence, and inserting in lieu thereof '$7,500', and

"(B) by striking out the last two sentences.

"(2) Section 1304(b)(1) (relating to special rules) is amended by striking out 'if adjusted gross income is less than $5,000'.

"(e) Section 21(d) (relating to changes in rates during a taxable year) is amended to read as follows:

"'(d) CHANGES MADE BY TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969 IN CASE OF INDIVIDUALS.—In applying subsection (a) to a taxable year of an individual which is not a calendar year, each change made by the Tax Reform Act of 1969 in part I or in the application of part IV of subchapter B for purposes of the determination of taxable income shall be treated as a change in the rate of tax.'

"(f) EFFECTIVE DATES.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1970. The amendments made by subsections (c) and (d) of this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

"SEC. 804. COLLECTION OF INCOME TAX AT SOURCE ON WAGES.

"(a) REQUIREMENT OF WITHHOLDING.—Section 3402(a) (relating to requirement of withholding) is amended to read as follows:

"'(a) REQUIREMENT OF WITHHOLDING.—In the case of wages paid after December 31, 1969, or the 15th day after the date of the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 (whichever is later), every employer making payment of wages shall deduct and withhold upon such wages (except as otherwise provided in this section) a tax determined in accordance with tables prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. Such tables shall correspond in form to the tables in effect under this subsection on December 31, 1969. For purposes of applying such tables, the term "amount of wages" means the amount by which the wages exceed the number of withholding exemptions claimed, multiplied by the amount of one such exemption as shown in subsection (b)(1)'.

"(b) PERCENTAGE METHOD OF WITHHOLDING.—

"(1) WAGES PAID IN 1970.—Effective with respect to wages paid during 1970, the table contained in section 3402(b)(1) is amended to read as follows:

"'Percentage Method Withholding Table

"'Payroll period

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered on the pending Gore amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, is it my understanding that under the rules an amendment or a substitute may not be offered by the sponsor without unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the yeas and nays have been ordered the Senator loses his right to modify his amendment but he can still offer an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. To his own amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To his own amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the substitute which I have offered has been offered after a thorough canvass.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the Senator is entitled to quiet.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment I have offered as a substitute for my own amendment, No. 304, has been offered after a thorough canvass which demonstrates that there is an overwhelming majority in this body, in my opinion, and in the opinion of those who have canvassed the situation, that we have tax relief by way of raising the personal exemption in preference to a change in the rates.

The disagreement, with the exception of an unusually small number of Senators, particularly on this side of the aisle, is on the amount by which the personal exemption should be increased.

The amendment which I originally offered provided for an increase of $100 per year until in the year 1973 the total exemption would be $1,000. One Senator who has been the champion of this cause longer than I, has just entered the Chamber, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN). Both on the floor of the Senate in an eloquent speech and in the cloakroom with the senior Senator from Tennessee, and the leadership of the Democratic Party, he has pleaded that the amendment be limited to 2 years; that is, that the personal exemption be increased next year to $700, and in 1971 and thereafter to $800, leaving the other provisions in the amendment as they are—the low-income allowance and tax treatment of single taxpayers similar to that provided in the committee bill.

So, Mr. President, the amendment which I now offer to my own amendment would increase the personal exemption in two steps to $800, and provide a low-income allowance of $1,000, and the treatment of unmarried taxpayers similar to the committee bill, as a substitute for the rate changes in the committee bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it would seem to me that if the Senator wants to modify his amendment, he should have the right to do so. If he is not going to do so, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator be permitted to modify his amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire how the Senator wishes to modify the amendment.

Mr. GORE. The modification would——

Mr. SCOTT. How does the Senator propose it?

Mr. GORE. The modification of the amendment would strike from the amendment the third and fourth phased steps. My original amendment would increase personal exemption from $600 to $700; then to $800; then to $900; then to $1,000, in four annual steps.

As I have introduced it now, this amendment would increase the personal exemption only to $800 in two steps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Louisiana asking unanimous consent to modify the original Gore amendment to include the second Gore amendment?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I object. I wish to have a rollcall vote on the substitute.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what is wrong about the parliamentary situation that exists at this point is that if the Senator wanted to offer an amendment to provide for $800 he should have offered an amendment to provide for $800, or he should have withdrawn his first amendment and offered the one he wanted to offer. He could not do that because from a parliamentary point of view he asked for the yeas and nays, or another Senator had asked for the yeas and nays, and he was foreclosed.

In that respect, the usual courtesy in this body is to accord a Senator the courtesy of modifying his amendment in any fashion he wants.

I requested that, feeling the Senator was entitled to it if he wanted to modify his amendment.

Also, I am aware of the fact that when a Senator offers an amendment and then offers an amendment to his own amendment, he forecloses 99 other Senators from modifying the amendment, which they would have a right to do.

I do not think the Senator from Tennessee, when he started his effort to have his amendment agreed to, had any intention of offering a substitute for his amendment, certainly not so as to foreclose 99 other Senators. I do not think that he had that in mind. But, it would have that effect.

I do not care to modify his amendment. I know how I am going to vote. It occurs that someone else might want to offer an amendment to his amendment and the Senator, by moving in the fashion he has, has foreclosed the rights of other Senators. I know there are other ways that it can be done but I think in the ordinary parliamentary situation one offers what he believes in, whether it be in the first degree or the second degree, and reserves to other Senators the right to offer their amendments. In this procedure the committee offers the bill and any Senator can amend it with a substitute or an amendment, if he feels he has a better idea.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I had the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I had reserved the right to object.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offered the substitute and then I obtained recognition.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not understand how the Senator would get the floor when I objected. Will the Parliamentarian explain how I came to have the floor and when I gave it up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not yield further for the moment.

This is not the first time that I have been involved in parliamentary procedure. I understand his rights and the rights of every other Senator. The facts are just to the contrary of those stated by the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG).

The offering of a substitute in no way precludes any other Senator from offering a perfecting amendment. As a matter of fact, all perfecting amendments to the original amendment take precedence over the substitute. Thus, there is no question about that. The Presiding Officer is perfectly aware of that. What this does do is to give me an opportunity to present to the Senate the amendment we now have, which I am advised and determined is supported by a clear majority, for an $800 exemption. I would prefer a $1,000 exemption, but the important thing is to substitute tax relief by way of increasing the personal exemption for tax reduction by way of rate changes. Therefore, this assures a vote for the $800 exemption level which the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN) has been urging, and other Senators have said they would support.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, would the distinguished Senator from Tennessee consent to an arrangement whereby his new amendment could be reduced to writing? After all, we are involved here with some $5 billion.

Mr. GORE. It already is.

Mr. CURTIS. Our staff people might want to take a look at it.

Mr. GORE. It is reduced to writing. It is now at the desk, in writing. I was prepared for that.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the Senator offered it by number?

Mr. GORE. I have sent it to the desk. It is in writing and is now at the desk.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. May I inquire of the Senator if he knew that the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) was seeking recognition for the purpose of offering a substitute at the time he was recognized?

Mr. GORE. I was aware that both the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Illinois were addressing the Chair. The Chair recognized the Senator from Tennessee. Let me say that it is perfectly proper, since the Senator from Tennessee has an amendment pending and is a member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SCOTT. And has offered a substitute to his own amendment. That is where we are now?

Mr. GORE. Correct.

Mr. SCOTT. Is the Senator from Tennessee prepared to permit any other Senator to offer an amendment to his substitute?

Mr. GORE. I think that is in the third degree. Amendments are in order. That is not a question that should be addressed to me. It should be addressed to the Presiding Officer and the Parliamentarian. As I understand it, an amendment to a substitute would be an amendment in the third degree and not in order. A thousand amendments are in order to the original amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I hope that the Senate would permit the Senator from Tennessee to modify his amendment. I know that the yeas and nays were ordered on it last evening. I know that a Senator can modify his own amendment only by unanimous consent, but, as has been pointed out, there is an easy way around that. Of course, it would delay consideration of the bill a few more hours, but I am hopeful that the Senate would permit the Senator to modify his amendment. I wanted to ask for the yeas and nays last evening and supported it in principle. We will have a record vote on it. We will also have a record vote on final passage of the bill, but I hope that the Senate will allow the Senator from Tennessee to modify his amendment. It will save a lot of time.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the sponsors of the original amendment be listed as sponsors of the substitute amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, am I recognized? I want to get that clear first. May I ask the Parliamentarian——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania may reserve his right to object, but the Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the Parliamentarian to advise the Chair as to the circumstances under which the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) may offer an amendment either to the substitute or to the original amendment or to the text of this section of the bill?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I yield for that parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original language of the bill, commencing on line 5, page 454 to page 497, is open to a perfecting amendment; likewise, the first substitute to strike out and insert is also.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, pursuing my parliamentary inquiry, what is the situation? If the request of the Senator from Tennessee for unanimous consent is granted and he is permitted to modify his amendment, then the substitute amendment is open—is his substitute open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If he is granted unanimous consent to modify his original amendment to embody the text of the second amendment, we are then back to the original situation and the matter would be open to amendment, as we were before the present situation occurred.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending request.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. ALLOTT. As I understand it, the distinguished Senator from Tennessee proposes a unanimous-consent request——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator restate his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. ALLOTT. Has he withdrawn his unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GORE. A rollcall vote has been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be listed as a cosponsor of the pending substitute amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be listed as a co-sponsor of the pending substitute amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have been waiting all day to get the floor. I have asked a number of Members to accommodate me but they have all been too busy. Now I hope that the Senate will indulge me for a few minutes while I do some business that I have been waiting to do all day.

LESSONS OF THE MYLAI INCIDENT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, press accounts of the alleged brutal killings at Mylai have assailed the conscience of the Nation and have sent shock waves of protest reverberating throughout the world. The allegations concerning the incident at Mylai are of enormous significance in the future of the Vietnam war, because they have propelled the American people across a new psychological threshold with respect to the Vietnam war. Under the new conditions created by the Mylai disclosures, President Nixon's strategy for peace in Vietnam, as stated in his November 3 speech, is no longer acceptable even to the majority claimed for it.

Certainly, the deep revulsion caused by the Mylai disclosures is a reality which the President must now take into account. It is now much more difficult to state, as President Nixon did in Vietnam on July 30 to the soldiers of the 1st Infantry Division:

> I think history will record that this (war) may have been one of America's finest hours . . .

And, for President Nixon to persist in his November 3 strategy, which is so heavily dependent on acts within the control of both Saigon and Hanoi, is now likely to prove to be untenable. The profound corruption of which this war is capable has now been exposed; not alone because of the alleged brutality—horrible as that is—but because of its evidence of the hopelessness of our remaining as the stand-ins of the South Vietnamese themselves in a fight for their self-determination. The U.S. war effort in Vietnam has suffered from fatal flaws and inconsistencies; now they have all come to a focus together. The war against "external aggression" by North Vietnam, the war against Communist Chinese expansionism, the war to defend the right of self-determination in South Vietnam—so constantly expounded by President Johnson and Secretary Rusk—has now become a war where every stated objective is dubious and where there is grave doubt that the South Vietnamese themselves even want us there.

The price which has been paid by the American people—materially and psychologically—to fight this war and to sustain the growing unbridgeable discrepancy between reality and official pronouncements has reached intolerable proportions. A painful, damaging, and unprecedented alienation has developed between the enormous body of student groups and the administration of President Johnson and now of President Nixon and Vice President AGNEW.

The effect of the Vietnam war on many other young men who have gone to Vietnam to fight—among them the poor, the black, the dropouts—has been even crueler.

The task of a Senator at this point is not to make final judgments about what happened at Mylai as to individuals—there are established judicial proceedings to do this. Rather, I consider it to be the responsibility of a Senator to recognize the significance of the Mylai disclosures with respect to the broad policy decisions now pending before the Nation, and to urge the President—who must make the final, excruciating choices—to recognize their significance, too.

I believe it is essential to the Nation's well-being that President Nixon recognize that the whole psychological environment in the United States has been transformed by the Mylai reports. The arguments and reasoning which have been used to explain and support the "gradualist" policies of the Nixon administration—notwithstanding the President's laudable decision to withdraw 60,000 troops—have given a sense of identity with the Vietnam policies and objectives of the Johnson administration. All this now has been undone at a stroke.

Inevitably, there will be powerful voices from within the administration counseling the President to take actions designed to blunt or counteract the effects of the Mylai reports. We will perhaps see efforts to arouse the public by counter revelations of atrocities by the Vietcong—and they are of course many times worse and much longer continued than even the worst we hear about Mylai. But this will prove to be of little comfort to us!

In my judgment, the proper course now for President Nixon is to lead the Nation out of Vietnam in the earliest and most considered manner possible and this requires a more rapid timetable that contemplated by his November 3 speech. The double veto that now exists over present withdrawal policy—one in the hands of Saigon and one in the hands of Hanoi—must be reclaimed. The time has passed quires a more rapid timetable than conditioned on improved political and military capabilities of the Thieu regime is a viable course for the United States; or, when a policy of withdrawal based on Hanoi's battlefield 'restraint' is a viable course for the United States.

The time has come for the President of the United States to lead the Nation clearly, quickly, and unequivocably out of Vietnam. And in this the U.S. Military Establishment also has a new responsibility. Here, too, is a test of the military establishment and its amenability to civilian control in the highest American tradition. In my judgment, it is now essential that the U.S. Military Establishment itself accept the responsibility for preparing the quickest and most orderly withdrawal from Vietnam. It must assess to the satisfaction of civilian control the pattern of U.S. withdrawal, consistent with battlefield security, and leaving the most favorable position which can be attained under the circumstances to the South Vietnamese forces.

I believe that it is essential that the U.S. Military Establishment undertake this task for two reasons. First, because it is its duty under orders to devise an orderly and effective withdrawal; and second, because the honor of our military forces demands it. Our forces have fought the war with great bravery and skill under most difficult circumstances. The same bravery and the same skill are now called upon to extricate our Nation from an impossible war situation. Our armed forces are capable of both.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

AMENDMENT NO. 340

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, which I ask to have printed under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the desk.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have introduced, today for myself and Mr. CASE of New Jersey, an amendment to those provisions in the now-pending tax reform bill which relate to philanthropic activities.

We are properly concerned about the fact that some individuals have been able to use the present unlimited charitable tax deduction to avoid the payment of taxes altogether and that some foundations have abused their tax-exempt status. However, in seeking the quite proper objective of "tax reform," we must bear in mind that it is essential to the health of our society that the activities of private philanthropies be not undone, and yet that may well happen in the bill we have before us.

We must make every effort to preserve the flexibility and the capacity to innovate which philanthropic institutions have demonstrated in the past. These private institutions have demonstrated a capacity to respond more readily than governments to a wide variety of social needs. Moreover, by their very nature, the foundations are able to engage in experimental activities of great social value which public agencies cannot very well pursue. Certainly, in our efforts to prevent improper activities, we should not inhibit these important sources of creativity and innovation.

Some of the important tax changes proposed in respect of philanthropic activities are, I believe, being proposed without adequate realization of the effects they will have on philanthropic activities. We thus run the risk of seriously injuring one of the important institutional bases of our society. We run the dangerous risk of substantially cutting off the flow of adequate funds to our universities, to medical research, and to social welfare at the very time when there is widespread agreement that nongovernmental institutions which work in these areas, and are at least partially dependent upon philanthropy for these activities, are facing growing financial crises.

Mr. President, at the outset, I must emphasize that I support those provisions in the House-passed and Senate Finance Committee bills which would seek to insure that foundations distribute their funds for philanthropic purposes and which seek to correct abuses related to the business—as opposed to the philanthropic—activities of foundations. But, because their financial requirements will rise rapidly in the coming years, we should direct our attention toward tax reforms to increase, rather than inhibit, the net private giving available to philanthropy.

The amendment which I introduce today would establish a Presidential Commission on Philanthropic Activities. This Commission would undertake a broad and detailed study of philanthropy and of the effect of tax relief granted for such activities and report to the President and the Congress no later than June 30, 1971. In addition, this amendment would make the following changes in the tax reform bill now before us:

First. Those provisions of the Senate Finance Committee bill which would limit the tax-exempt life of certain foundations are deleted.

Second. Those provisions of the Senate bill which would require divestiture of stock ownership are deleted. However, provision is made to insure that foundations do not increase their holdings by purchase pending action on the report of the Presidential Commission.

Third. Those provisions of the Senate bill which would limit—beyond the extent presently permitted by existing law—the activities of foundations are deleted.

Fourth. The prohibitions of the Senate bill against self-dealing are extended to all foundations and not just to private foundations.

Fifth. The limitations of the Senate bill with respect to the use of foundation assets—that is, the investment of its corpus—are extended to all foundations and not just to private foundations.

Sixth. Except for the raising of the charitable contribution deduction to 50 percent and the repeal of the unlimited charitable deduction, the remaining provisions of the Senate bill affecting charitable contributions are deleted.

All items which would be deleted are specifically referred to the Presidential Commission for study and report.

THE PRESIDENTIAL COMMISSION

I have urged the establishment of this Presidential Commission because I believe that it is vitally necessary that the basic issue of the tax incentive to philanthropic contributions, which is justified by social usefulness, be made the subject of study by an impartial and bipartisan high level commission. The Peterson commission, an independent body which has recently completed a study of foundations, found that there is so little information available that it is generally not possible to substantiate or refute many of the general charges of abuse and excess.

The Presidential Commission would be composed of 25 members chosen by the President on a nonpartisan basis according to the formula set forth in the amendment. There would be two Members each from the House and Senate, representatives from the legal and accounting profession, the major religions, educators, scientists, philanthropists, and representatives from the general public. This Commission would represent a broad cross section of contemporary American opinion and would be able to objectively address the issues which they have been commissioned to study.

The Treasury and the committees of Congress having jurisdiction over taxes would be expected to provide technical and other assistance as and when requested. In addition, the Commission would be able to retain consultants and other advisers as deemed necessary.

The Commission would be asked to examine the entire structure of exemptions from income tax granted by section 501 et seq. of the Code together with the charitable deductions granted by section 170 and related sections of the Code, including similar deductions granted under the estate and gift tax laws. Paramount in this examination—and an integral part of any such examination—would be a determination as to the value of such privately provided services to our society. Also the question of cost to the Government in granting this form of tax relief versus the cost of providing comparable services out of the general tax revenues would have to be considered.

The Commission would also be required to assess present Government supervision of the foundations and make recommendations for strengthened regulations. It would seek out the abuses and the facts that we presently do not have available to us—or available only in skeleton form. It is clear that better auditing procedures, more vigorous public disclosure requirements and strengthened sanctions for violators are needed.

The Commission would be asked to review the scope of activities for which tax concessions are granted to determine whether they are still as relevant to the needs of our society today as they were when the great bulk of them were established more than 50 years ago. It would also be asked to recommend to Congress and the administration new incentive approaches to philanthropic giving.

Another area of great importance which the Commission would be asked to study is the possibility of establishing a permanent body, separate and apart from the Internal Revenue Service, which would pass on public policy questions in the philanthropic tax-exempt area. I believe that such a body may be necessary, since very little that will be done in this area will be without social effect, and it is unwise to have the revenue-collecting decision and the public policy decision rest in the same hands, lest the revenue-producing decision take precedence to the detriment of the public good.

Pending the completion of the Commission's work, my amendment proposes that the House and Senate Finance Committee proposed changes in our internal revenue code affecting charitable contributions and tax treatment of private foundations as they relate to philanthropic activities be set aside and be referred to the Commission for further study, rather than changing existing law at this time.

In the report of the Finance Committee under the general heading, "A Tax Treatment of Private Foundations," changes in the tax code are recommended under 13 major headings. My amendment proposes to refer only three of these headings to the Commission. These are:

First. Limitation on tax exempt life: My amendment deletes these provisions of the bill and refers this question to the Commission for study and recommendation. I can understand the concern of the Senate Finance Committee in recommending this measure. Many foundations, even those with a considerable amount of public support, have independent governing bodies which are self-perpetuating. These organizations are said to be in no way susceptible to social and public pressures as a result, and are, therefore, frequently not responsive to need. These institutions are largely unique in our society; government has the voters to which it must be responsive, and as we are learning every day, colleges have their students and faculty and alumni who are demanding they be responsive. In my judgment, philanthropic institutions need some means which will insure responsiveness. Terminating tax-exempt existence after 40 years is not the answer. Some institutions should, perhaps, be terminated sooner; others after a much longer period, if at all. I would give the Presidential Commission, which I suggest, the opportunity to review the activities of foundations and to adopt a system to insure responsiveness to change and social need. I do not recommend that foundations be given the alternative of either becoming an operating foundation or a public charity or going out of business since I do not believe that anyone is in a position to determine today on this bill that 40 years is too long or too short or equally applicable to all.

Second. Stock ownership limitation: My amendment deletes this provision and forwards it to the Commission for further study. While I support philosophically the concept that foundations should be divorced from the control of businesses to the greatest possible extent, I have been impressed by the report made to the Senate Finance Committee by the Commission on Foundations and Private Philanthropy that "more than three-quarters of the assets of foundations were contributed in the form of appreciated intangible property. And more than half was stock of a company in which the donor and his family has an interest in excess of 20 percent"—page 38. This report has led me to the conclusion that we need to study this matter in greater detail.

Third. Limitations on the activities of foundations: The amendment I introduce would delete these provisions of the bill and refer this issue to the Presidential Commission for study and recommendation. We must be certain that our foundations can properly investigate and report on problems which confront our society and which may presently be, or which may become, the subject of legislation. Provisions which limit such activities must be carefully worded so that they are consistent with our true intent—that is, the prevention of so-called lobbying and of the furtherance of special interests. I do not believe that the provisions in this bill or in the House-passed bill satisfactorily meet our objective in this area. Certainly much greater understanding of the situation is required.

The other provisions of my amendment relate to the following:

Charitable contributions: I agree with the raising of the charitable contribution deduction to 50 percent and the repeal of the unlimited charitable deduction. Both represent the important measures of tax reform in the charitable contribution area and have significant revenue effect. However, I would recommend deletion and further study of other provisions in this bill dealing with charitable contributions. They do not have an important revenue effect, and their potential impact on private giving is not yet adequately understood.

Prohibition on self-dealing: Self-dealing has been an important area of abuse. My amendment imposes the same restrictions against self-dealing on all philanthropic institutions as are presently imposed against private foundations by the Finance Committee bill. I fail to understand why the element of public support makes the public charities any less susceptible to self-dealing than in the case of the private foundation. Both categories should be held to the same high standards. Instances of abuse in the public charity area can be as serious.

Limitations on the use of assets: This amendment would impose the same standards on public charities as the bill would impose on private foundations. My reasons are largely the same as in the case of the prohibitions against self-dealing. All philanthropic institutions should be held to the same high standard. In addition, I see just as much potential for abuse in the case of a public charity although the likelihood may not be as great.

In summary, my amendment seeks to capture the spirit of both the House and Finance Committee tax reform bills by incorporating major provisions. In terms of substance, I believe that my amendment goes even further to the heart of the matter by imposing the highest standards on all foundations whether public or privately and by initiating the first major review in 50 years of those provisions about which there is a need for further study. The further study will be conducted by a Presidential Commission of the highest caliber.

I have proposed this amendment only after consulting with many philanthropic leaders and with some of the leading foundations based in New York. I recognize—and commend my colleagues on the Senate Finance Committee for their praiseworthy efforts in improving significantly on the House tax reform bill, but, I remain concerned that some of the remaining tax changes as they relate to philanthropic contributions would dangerously decrease the amount of funds available for purposes of education and philanthropy. I have proposed my amendment as an alternative for my colleagues who are concerned not only with the grave issues of tax reform, but also with the grave issues of social welfare and innovation in a pluralistic society.

I urge the Senate to accept this amendment. It is essential to the health and well being of those philanthropic activities which have contributed to our national growth and progress and to that pluralism which has been so important to innovation and to discovery in the fields of science, social welfare, and the humanities.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I should like again to address the Chair with an inquiry concerning the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it possible to offer an amendment to this substitute to raise the exemption back up to $1,000, or do we have to defeat the substitute in order to vote on the proposition the Senator from Tennessee originally offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last substitute is not open to amendment.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President——

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. This tactic that has just been used is one I disagree with. I should like to be respectful, as much as I can, as a new Member, but I would like to have voted on the $1,000 exemption. I believed in it. I stated when the poll was taken on this side that I believed in it, and I think that should have been conveyed to the other side. But in any event, I do not think we ought to be shut off from voting on the $1,000 proposition.

The exemption was $1,000 back in Lincoln's day. At the time of the first income tax ever adopted in this country, there was a $1,000 personal exemption; and here we are, at this time, dealing with a situation where we are shut off from voting on it because of a parliamentary tactic, apparently on the basis of who gets credit for suggesting the $800 idea.

I do not know what the leadership believes about this, but I would like to find out if it is possible to put this thing off until we consider the proposition that has been offered here. I have not even seen it yet. It seems to me that some of the developments here are likely to prevent us from getting a tax reform bill, if this sort of maneuvering continues.

AMENDMENTS NO. 338

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I send four perfecting amendments to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I believe these perfecting amendments should be explained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read the amendments, as follows:

"'(B) the additional allowance.

"'(2) BASIC ALLOWANCE.—For purposes of this subsection, the basic allowance is an amount equal to the sum of—

"'(A) $200, plus

"'(B) $100, multiplied by the number of exemptions.

The basic allowance shall not exceed $1,100.

"'(3) ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCE.—

"'(A) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this subsection, the additional allowance is an amount equal to the excess (if any) of $850 over the sum of—

"'(i) $100, multiplied by the number of exemptions, plus

"'(ii) the income phase-out.

"'(B) INCOME PHASE-OUT.—For purposes of subparagraph (A)(ii), the income phase-out is an amount equal to one-half of the amount by which the adjusted gross income for the taxable year exceeds the sum of—

"'(i) $1050 plus

"'(ii) $650, multiplied by the number of exemptions.

"'(4) MARRIED INDIVIDUALS FILING SEPARATE RETURNS.—In the case of a married taxpayer filing a separate return—

"'(A) the low income allowance is an amount equal to the basic allowance, and

"'(B) the basic allowance is an amount (not in excess of $525) equal to the sum of—

"'(i) $100, plus

"'(ii) $100, multiplied by the number of exemptions.

"'(5) NUMBER OF EXEMPTIONS.—For purposes of this subsection, the number of exemptions is the number of exemptions allowed as a deduction for the taxable year under section 151.

"'(6) SPECIAL RULE FOR 1971 AND 1972.—For a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1970, and before January 1, 1973—

"'(A) paragraph (2) shall be applied by substituting "$1,000" for "$1,050";

"'(B) paragraph (3)(A) shall be applied by substituting "$800" for "850".

"(a) REQUIREMENT OF WITHHOLDING.—In the case of wages paid after December 31, 1969, or the 15th day after the date of the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 (whichever is later), every employer making payment of wages shall deduct and withhold upon such wages (except as otherwise provided in this section) a tax determined in accordance with tables prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. Such tables shall correspond in form to the tables in effect under this subsection on December 31, 1969. For purposes of applying such tables, the term "amount of wages" means the amount by which the wages exceed the number of withholding exemptions claimed, multiplied by the amount of one such exemption as shown in subsection (b)(1)'.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I think the majority leader's request that there be an explanation of these perfecting amendments is certainly in order. This is an exceedingly important matter, a matter that I have discussed with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Late this afternoon I went over them in detail with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, as a courtesy to him, so that he would be completely aware of what I had in mind and why I intended to offer these perfecting amendments, at this time as a substitute for his amendment.

The amendments provide tax relief close to the same amount, and phased in gradually, as does the committee bill. They provide, however, an increase in the personal exemption up to $800 by 1973. They provide a low-income allowance of $1,000, and increase the standard deduction as the Senate Finance bill does, but set the increases off 1 year from the committee bill schedule, and provide relief for single persons and some rate reductions.

In effect, what I have tried to do is stay as close as possible to the bill which the Committee on Finance has worked on for many months.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PASTORE. Is it in order to move that these perfecting amendments be laid on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion would be in order.

Is there a sufficient second on the request for the yeas and nays?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, could we have the action on the request for the yeas and nays first?

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator from Illinois yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does the rollcall that has been ordered in any way affect the pending unanimous-consent request that the perfecting amendments be considered en bloc?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be considered en bloc, and voted on together.

Mr. GORE. Consent was not so granted. How does the rollcall affect that lack of consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there were objections, and heard none.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Tennessee was advised that no such action was taken by the Chair. I was on my feet, awaiting his statement on the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator like the record read back?

Mr. GORE. Yes. The majority leader suggested it, did he?

Mr. PASTORE. Yes.

Mr. GORE. At any rate, the RECORD will show.

Mr. President, I understood that the majority leader asked for an explanation. I was on my feet awaiting the submission of the unanimous-consent request. If the unanimous-consent request was granted, I was not aware of it. The RECORD would show. I would like to have the RECORD read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The official reporter will read the RECORD.

The Official Reporter of Debates (Mr. Grant E. Perry) read as follows:

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I send four perfecting amendments to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I withdraw my request.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, did I correctly understand the Senator to say that the amendment was a substitute for the pending amendment?

Mr. PERCY. It is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. PASTORE. In substitution of the perfecting amendment? I understood the Senator to say that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four perfecting amendments were offered to the language of the bill to be stricken out.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I had intended originally to offer a substitute amendment, as I advised the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, feeling it to be a courtesy to him.

I feel it rather unusual when the procedure has been outlined so clearly that an amendment would be offered for a $1,000 exemption, as stated by the Senator from Alaska, then $900, and then $800, that immediately upon being notified that I intended to offer a substitute and told the Senator from Tennessee, he saw fit immediately to rush in with an $800 exemption.

As I advised him last week, I felt I could not vote for his kind of amendment because it would be irresponsible as far as the budget is concerned and as far as the action of the administration and Congress in fighting inflation is concerned.

I hope the Senator is now in agreement that the $1,000 exemption, which would occasion a tremendous deficit to the budget at this particular time and jeopardize every effort that the Congress and the administration have made to fight inflation, certainly would not be in the best interest of the country.

It is for this reason that I feel we should stay as close as possible to the committee bill which provides many of the reforms and improvements that the Finance Committee has seen fit to make in its recommendations. It is certainly something that the Senate should now consider.

I do feel that there is a great deal to be said for increasing the personal exemption. Certainly, as the Senator from Tennessee has indicated many times on the floor of the Senate, one simply cannot raise a child for $50 a month. And people year after year after year have seen the same $600 exemption provided now for 26 years, yet we recognize that the cost of living has gone up many times since that original provision was made in our tax law.

I certainly concur in principle with the Senator from Tennessee that we should have an increase in the personal exemption. However, I think that we should struggle as best we can not only to keep our action fiscally responsible, but also to preserve as many of the principles as possible that the Finance Committee has worked out.

It is for this reason that I have graduated the increase in the personal exemption provision I am now offering so as to increase the personal exemption just $50 in the first year, in 1970. It would be increased from $600 to $650 in 1970, to $700 in 1971, to $750 in 1972, and to $800 in 1973 and subsequent years. However, the 10 percent standard reduction with a $1,000 ceiling is increased to a 15 percent standard deduction with a $2,000 ceiling, as it has been presented in the Finance Committee bill that is pending.

The amendment provides that the percentage of standard deduction is to be 13 percent with a $1,400 ceiling in 1971, 14 percent with a $1,700 ceiling in 1972, and 15 percent with a $2,000 ceiling in 1973 and subsequent years. This is the same increase offered in the committee bill. However, it has been phased in, one year later, so as to lessen the financial impact in the early years when inflation is our greatest enemy, particularly so which respect to poor people and people who are living on fixed incomes. We preserve the provision but delay its enactment for the one year.

The amendment provides for a low income allowance of $1,000—$500 for a married couple filing separate returns—in 1973 and subsequent years.

Under the committee bill, the low income allowance would be $1,100 for 1972 and subsequent years. However, the additional $100 is not needed to maintain the same level of tax free income due to the increase in the personal exemption.

The amendment provides for a phase-out of the low-income allowance in 1970, 1971, and 1972 as the income of the taxpayer increases similar to the phase-out provided in the committee bill but adjusted to take account of the increase in the personal exemption.

The amendment provides new rate schedules for single persons consistent with the principle of the committee bill that a single person shall pay no more than 20 percent greater tax than a married couple with the same taxable income. A new rate schedule, consistent with the principle of the committee bill, is also provided for heads of households with rates one-half way between those provided in the new rate schedule for single persons and the rate schedule for married couples.

The amendment provides no rate reduction for 1971. Under the rate schedule applicable in 1972, one-fourth of the total rate reduction of the committee bill is provided and in 1973, one-half of the total rate reduction of the committee bill is provided. It would be the expressed hope that fiscal conditions would permit three-fourths of the total rate reduction to be applicable in 1974 and the full schedule in 1975 and subsequent years.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee did not take into account any rate changes. The committee labored long and hard to strike a balance that was equitable and effective.

It recognized that in closing loopholes and changing procedures that have been followed for many years by higher income people that those higher income people will now be paying substantially higher taxes as a result. And over a period of time there should be an adjustment in all tax rates.

I believe the figure used shows an average of about 5 percent tax reduction for all taxpayers.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in view of the statement the Senator made earlier to the effect that the procedure appeared to him to be a bit unusual, I would like to have his consent to recall the RECORD.

The able senior Senator from Illinois did advise the senior Senator from Tennessee some time approximately 2 hours ago that he was preparing and contemplating the offering of a substitute amendment, which he stated he did out of courtesy. And I appreciate that.

I advised the Senator that the senior Senator from Tennessee had his own substitute prepared in case it became necessary or advisable so to offer it.

I had also prepared additional amendments, of which the Senator was advised in the RECORD, that might possibly be offered.

I think the RECORD should show that there has been some jockeying underway during the course of the afternoon. It appears that a clear majority of the Senate wishes to raise the personal exemption to $800. The senior Senator from Tennessee recalled the possibility that as a result of diligent work, procrastination, and maneuvering, an attempt was made—that might be successful—to steal away the amendment to provide an increase in the personal exemption.

After conferring with the leadership and his colleagues on this side of the aisle, it was determined and agreed that it would be the better part of wisdom, though the vote would be close on the $1,000 proposal, to vote instead on $800.

It seemed to be surer for $800. So the senior Senator from Tennessee rose and sought recognition, obtained recognition, and offered the amendment. The senior Senator from Tennessee sees nothing unusual about this, if "unusual" means anything more than a rare use of the rules of the Senate. The rules are there for all to use.

If the Senator will yield one step further, the senior Senator from Tennessee has had the staff analyze the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Illinois. It provides a revenue loss estimated at $12.8 billion. It is a mixture of low-income allowance, rate changes, and an increase in the personal exemption; and it is an expensive amendment, may I say to the Senate.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I appreciate the explanation. I should like to reaffirm that I feel it is an unusual procedure to indicate that we are going to vote on a $1,000 exemption and then to have an $800 exemption suddenly before us. But I think—and I trust—it is a recognition that the $12 billion cost to the budget of the $1,000 exemption would be exorbitant, could not be absorbed, and should not be proposed at this time in view of the fight against inflation.

The figures given by the distinguished Senator with reference to the revenue loss that would be incurred by the proposals I am making are totally erroneous. The loss is very slight in the early years, whereas the loss is very heavy in the distinguished Senator from Tennessee's proposals.

In fiscal 1970 and 1971 we will still be fighting the battle of inflation, and in those years that loss will run close to $5 billion under the Senator from Tennessee's proposals. The figures I have received from the Treasury Department on the proposals I have made are less than a billion dollars in those same years.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator's amendment proposes a low-income allowance of $1,000. Is that correct?

Mr. PERCY. That is correct—phased in by 1973.

Mr. GORE. What would be the revenue loss of this amendment when fully effective?

Mr. PERCY. I have only the composite figures—the total effect of the amendment—from the Treasury Department. The composite effect in revenue loss in the first year against the Finance Committee bill is $400 million.

Mr. GORE. When it is fully effective. The Treasury Department has been condemning the amendment which the senior Senator from Tennessee has offered and has given alarming figures as to what its effect would be when fully effective. Now I am asking the Senator from Illinois what would be the revenue effect of his low-income allowance when fully effective. It happens to be identical with the one I offered originally.

Mr. PERCY. The full effect would be $5.8 billion, when the full $800 exemption——

Mr. GORE. This is not the question I asked the Senator. I asked the Senator—I am taking one step at a time—what would be the full revenue effect of his low-income allowance when fully effective. The answer is $2 billion.

Mr. PERCY. I think the overall figure is $5.3 billion, and I can give the Senator the best estimates we have now. In the first year, about one-half billion dollars would be the effect; in the second year, approximately $400 million; in the third year, $600 million; and in the fourth year, $3.8 billion.

The reason why I think it is exceedingly important that we have the bulge at the end rather than at the beginning is that if the economy cannot absorb or take that kind of impact, we still can do something about it. But if the impact is in 1970 and 1971, as it would be in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, there is nothing we can do about it, and we simply know that we have added and pumped several billion dollars more each year into the inflationary fires, which are roaring now and are running rampant.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator said that he is unable to give the Senate an estimate of the effect of his low-income allowance.

Mr. PERCY. The low-income allowance is similar to that in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Then, the answer is that, when fully effective, the effect would be the same.

Mr. PERCY. Exactly the same.

Mr. GORE. That is, $2 billion.

What would be the effect of the Senator's amendment with respect to the standard deduction of 15 percent?

Mr. PERCY. Again, I cannot give the Senator broken-down figures. We will have those figures by tonight. The best estimates the Treasury can give are in the composite total. We can compute this very quickly, because it is exactly the same as the effect of the committee provision, but it is moved back 1 year, so that it will have no effect in 1970, and lessens the effect of this measure as against the Finance Committee measure. There will be no impact in 1970. It removes the impact until 1971, and then it will be the same.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Rather than go through each one of these items, when the Senator does not have the tabulation himself as to the effect of his amendment, and if the Senator will yield, I shall be glad to give my own staff's estimate.

Mr. PERCY. I certainly will, with the understanding that we both should accept figures certified to by the Treasury, or possibly by our own Finance Committee personnel, rather than our respective staffs.

Mr. GORE. If the distinguished Senator from Illinois will confer with the technical staff of the committee, he will find that the technical staff of the committee will verify the estimates of my own staff. They worked together very closely. According to my staff, the revenue loss of the low-income allowance is $2 billion.

Mr. PERCY. That is exactly the same as the Senator's provision in his own amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

The standard deduction of 15 percent, or a given amount, $1.373 billion.

Mr. PERCY. There is no change in 1970. So there can be no effect if there is no change.

Mr. GORE. I am speaking of when the reductions become fully effective.

The revenue loss from the rate reductions, one-half those in the committee bill, is $2.249 billion; the revenue loss from the single persons provision, $445 million; the revenue loss from personal exemption, $6.6 billion—making a total of $12.8 billion. The substitute amendment which I have offered will represent a revenue loss of $8.8 billion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Will the Senator suspend until the Senate is in order?

The staff personnel of Senators will take seats or leave the Chamber. The Chair, on its own initiative, instructs the Sergeant at Arms to question the staff personnel as to whether they are of immediate need in the Chamber, and if not, to request them to leave the Chamber immediately.

All staff personnel not immediately needed by their respective Senators will please leave the Chamber.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the revenue loss under the substitute amendment which I have offered would be $8.8 billion, which is approximately what the revenue loss would be under the terms of the committee bill, which loss is accomplished primarily through rate changes. So there is practically no more revenue loss from my amendment than is provided by the committee bill while the amendment of the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, according to the estimates I have—which I believe he will find will be agreed to by the technical staff—would be $12.8 billion.

I do not wish to press the point any further except to make one more reference. The Senator again refers to this as an unusual procedure. There is nothing unusual whatever in a Senator modifying his own amendment. Indeed, this is the usual procedure. The only thing that is rare about this procedure is that I did not wish to modify my amendment be consent. I wished to modify it by substitute amendment, which I did. I suggest there is nothing unusual except that it does not happen often.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I would like to repeat again the figures estimated by the Treasury Department. The figures of the Senator from Tennessee are without reform. The figures that should be kept in mind as a comparison between the two bills we are comparing are as follows: For 1970 the committee bill would bring about a revenue loss of $500 million. The best estimate as to the revenue loss in the first year impact, 1970, under the proposal by the Senator from Tennessee is $2.3 billion more than the committee bill while the amendment I have offered would provide a net loss of $500 million more than the committee bill.

I would say that is a whale of a difference in the impact on the economy, the impact on inflation, and the impact on every family in this country if we had that much more in the economy at that stage.

In 1971 the net effect of all the changes I have proposed would be a loss in revenue, between my provisions and the provisions of the bill by the committee, of $400 million. The net effect of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee in 1971 is a loss of revenue of $2.5 billion more than the committee.

To be fair I would like to continue this point because by 1972, unless inflation is so rampant and we have had to go into controls, there would be plus revenue in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee by about $100 million in 1972. In the proposals I have presented there would be a plus of $300 million, or in the same year $200 million more.

When the full impact of rate reductions, personal exemptions, and standard deductions has taken place, there would be a revenue loss of $3.8 billion in 1973. In the provision of the Senator from Tennessee there would be a net plus of $100 million.

I think the difference we are dealing with here in the provisions I have put in is that my provisions would preserve the integrity of the bill worked on by the Committee on Finance. It maintains those provisions but lessens their impact. In order to put in an increase in the personal exemption we have scaled down the provisions but they are there. They will be in the law, and they are principles that will guide us in the future. They are principles we can count on as we move ahead.

Furthermore, the impact is substantially less in the early years. These are years when we are fighting inflation. Certainly, therefore, if $3.8 billion were pumped back into the economy in 1973, who is wise enough to say we will not need that revenue at the consumer level? We certainly do not need it now. Now is when the impact of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would be adverse on the Treasury and the economy. Later we have plenty of time to make provision for it. This is a great difference. I have tried to preserve the work which has been done so ably and so skillfully by members and the staff of the Finance Committee. We have tried to provide something to take to conference that will give us leeway and that would give us the kind of revenue measure the Senator talked about in his opening remarks before the Senate.

This is as simple as I can explain it. I am sorry we did not have detailed statistics on the provisions, but in my judgment this represents a superior alternative and something that is in line with the President's letter to the distinguished minority leader tonight. I have gone over that letter with extreme care to make certain we meet the ends the President said we must meet to provide for reform, to provide a more equitable sharing of the tax load, and a lightening of the impact on the economy today when we cannot afford more money being pumped into the economy.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, there seems to be some disagreement on the floor of the Senate about the figures used. I wish to ask the Senator whether the figures he is using are based on inquiries directed to the Treasury Department officials. As I understand the situation, the Senator consulted with them and worked closely with them, and the figures he used are figures they provided. Is that correct?

Mr. PERCY. The Senator is absolutely correct. Technical personnel from the Department of the Treasury, as well as officials from the Office of the Secretary and the Under Secretary worked intimately to devise a way to increase the personal exemption, but to do so in a fair fashion. The figures are the best estimate the Treasury Department could provide.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may address an inquiry to the distinguished majority leader?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I understand we are now trying to work out time under which we can vote on the Percy perfecting amendment, and if it shall become necessary, on the Gore amendment thereafter.

I would like to ask the distinguished majority leader if he is prepared to propose a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the prayer tomorrow——

Mr. PASTORE. Which we need so badly. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANSFIELD (continuing). That there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, to be concluded at the hour of 10:30 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that beginning at the hour of 10:30 there be a time limitation on the pending collective perfecting motion by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, and that the vote occur at 11:30 a.m.; and that would include the possibility of tabling a motion at that time, if any Senator so desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That at the conclusion of the vote on the Percy perfecting amendments, there be a time limitation of 20 minutes, the time to be equally divided between the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) and the Republican leader, or whomever he may designate; 10 minutes apiece—the vote to occur on the Gore amendment at that time, amended or otherwise, at 10 minutes to 12.

Mr. GORE. There is my substitute and the——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, the substitute.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the Senator has allowed no time for the votes. He has just set a vote at 11:30 and then a vote at 10 minutes to 12, but no time for the vote itself, so that would leave no time——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Twenty minutes after the vote, at the conclusion of the 20 minutes—a vote on the Gore substitute, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I suggest that the time be controlled by the Senator from Tennessee and the chairman of the committee or whomever he may designate.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, for the purpose of asking a question of the distinguished majority leader, we have to have two rollcalls. There are two substitutes that we will be voting on.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is the third one?

Mr. GORE. The original amendment as amended. There will be a vote on his. There will be a vote on my substitute, and then there will be a vote on the amendment as amended.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes—they will follow one another in sequence.

Mr. CURTIS. That makes sense, yes?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on all three amendments.

The yeas and nays on all three amendments were ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, there will be no votes tonight.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the majority leader——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, incidentally, the unanimous request is under the usual formula.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Do I correctly understand that all three of these measures will be printed in the RECORD so that Senators will be able to read them in the RECORD that will come out tomorrow morning?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes. They will be printed in the RECORD because I understand that the Senator from Illinois has asked that that be done, or if he has not, he will.

Mr. HOLLAND. If they are going to be printed, I should also like to ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee whether his substitute amendment will also be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GORE. It has been submitted for the RECORD and I will submit at the conclusion some tables showing precisely its effects. It will all be in the RECORD tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, all amendments will be printed in the RECORD. Without objection the unanimous-consent request is agreed to.

The unanimous-consent agreement, later reduced to writing, is as follows:

Ordered, That on December 3, 1969, following the prayer and approval of the Journal, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10:30 a.m.

Ordered further, That the debate on the Percy perfecting amendments to the bill (No. 338), or any motions or amendments thereto be limited to 1 hour, beginning at 10:30 a.m., to be equally divided and controlled between the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), to be followed immediately by a vote thereon. Following the disposition of the Percy amendment, debate on the Gore substitute (No. 337) shall be limited to 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) and the minority leader, or someone designated by him, to be followed immediately by a vote thereon, and then immediately following that vote a vote will be taken on the Gore substitute amendment (No. 304) whether amended or not.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would hope that such information as can be made available to us, both on the modifications proposed to his amendment by the Senator from Tennessee, and also those suggested by the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), be made available in the RECORD, tonight if possible, because some of us—I am one of them—would like to understand as best we can what we will be voting on tomorrow as regards the merits or demerits of the relative proposals.

I believe I understand what the Senator from Tennessee had in mind when he made his motion. I have had some explanation available both before and during the debate with regard to the suggestions of the Senator from Illinois, but I would still hope very much that, insofar as it can be done, the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Tennessee try to let us know precisely what they have in mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will suspend.

The Senate will please be in order. Under rule XIX the Chair is required to maintain decorum in the Senate on his own initiative.

The Senator from Louisiana may proceed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would hope that both sponsors of the amendments will make available to us as much information as can be made available for the RECORD overnight because any Senator, such as the Senator from Louisiana, who prefers the committee bill as it was reported, will have to vote upon two amendments and he would like to have all the information he can when he votes on them.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD appropriate tables which will explain the provisions of the amendments I have made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. How does the Senator take care of single people?

Mr. PERCY. There is no change from the Senate Finance Committee bill. As I read in my opening statement, special provisions have been made in the Finance Committee bill, and they are preserved in this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. How could the Senator preserve them and change the rates at the same time? I understand that the Senator did change the rates.

Mr. PERCY. Yes, but proportionate benefits are offered to single people and they are preserved by this amendment—single, that is, head of a household, as well as a single individual—they are preserved by the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. One thing is not clear. I think I have it clear, and so does the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. COOK), but others may not. The Senator's perfecting amendments go up to the original text of the bill as reported by the Finance Committee, right?

Mr. PERCY. Well——

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONTOYA in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New York for that purpose?

Mr. PERCY. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JAVITS. Are perfecting amendments as submitted by the Senator from Illinois perfecting amendments to that provision of the bill which is deleted by the Gore substitute as reported by the Finance Committee?

Mr. PERCY. They are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The answer is "Yes."

Mr. JAVITS. Therefore, if the Percy amendments—I use that colloquial term—prevail, then the matter sought to be stricken by the Senator from Tennessee will be as amended by the Percy amendments; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. And if the Percy amendments fail, then they are washed out and they do not do anything to the Gore substitute, do they?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They do not affect the Gore substitute in any way. They could affect the original text.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly. I thank the Chair. I think that is very important for all Senators to note, because one might get the impression that the Senator from Illinois is amending the Gore substitute, but he is not. It will be necessary to defeat the Gore substitute even if we have carried the amendments of the Senator from Illinois, in order to give effect to what the Senator from Illinois is trying to do; is that not correct?

Mr. PERCY. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. It is very important that Senators understand exactly what the pattern is on which they will be voting tomorrow, and that there will be a third vote that will come on the resulting product from those first two; is that not correct?

Mr. PERCY. That is right.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I hope that all Senators will carefully note this colloquy before they come into the Chamber to vote tomorrow, because it has been very clearly stated, especially if one favors the third amendment——

Mr. JAVITS. If you like it.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, if you like it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the minority leader for that explanation.

Mr. GORE. I am confused. They have been trying to find a way to do that all afternoon. [Laughter.]

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD the tables I referred to earlier showing the impact of my subtsitute proposal to increase the personal exemption to $800.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order of yesterday, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 31 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 3, 1969, at 10 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 2, 1969:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Michael Collins, of Texas, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

U.S. MINT

Hildreth Frost, Jr., of Colorado, to be Assayer of the Mint of the United States at Denver, Colorado, vice Earl F. Haffey.

U.S. CIRCUIT JUDGE

Joe McDonald Ingraham of Texas to be U.S. Circuit Judge, Fifth Circuit vice a new position created under Public Law 90–347, approved June 18, 1968.

IN THE AIR FORCE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, December 2, 1969

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Only fear the Lord and serve Him in truth with all your heart: for consider what great things He has done for you.—I Samuel 12: 24.

Our Father, we thank Thee for the inspiration for great living this moment of prayer brings to us and for the insight into the meaning of life which comes as we pray. Never in vain do we call upon Thee. Always art Thou strengthening us with a strength which never lets us down. Always art Thou loving us with a love which never lets us go. Always art Thou leading us in true paths with a spirit which never lets us off. Give us grace to respond to Thee and with reverent courage to walk in Thy ways.

Bless our Nation with Thy gracious favor and these Representatives of our people with Thy loving wisdom. Kneeling before the altar of truth may we be united in the codes of high moral living, deep religious faith, great patriotic fervor, and a genuine desire for peace.

In the Master's name we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Arrington, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3169. An act to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and for other purposes.

THE FORT DIX STOCKADE

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to correct some statements attributed to one of our colleagues, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) concerning conditions at the Fort Dix stockade.

In the Philadelphia Inquirer of October 25, 1969, the gentleman from New York, from an AP report stated that conditions were "inhuman" and "very primitive." As chairman of a Special Subcommittee To Investigate Conditions in Places of Military Detention and Correction, I and two members of my subcommittee have visited Fort Dix. Our comments today constitute an interim report. There may be further investigation and further evaluation of our findings.

On November 7 I spent all day at Fort Dix with particular emphasis on the stockade. Other members had made visits on other dates. My observations were substantially different from those of the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI).

The maximum cells were not "small and dark" as reported in the paper and I found nothing in the Fort Dix stockade that reminded me of "medieval times," which was the description contained in the newspaper article.

I came away from Fort Dix convinced the commanding general was doing well in a difficult job. I was also convinced the provost marshal in command of the stockade was a dedicated military man who was genuinely concerned that there be no inhuman conditions of any kind in the Fort Dix stockade.

THE FORT DIX STOCKADE SITUATION

(Mr. DANIEL of Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANIEL of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, an Associated Press story appearing in the Philadelphia Inquirer on October 24 attributed certain statements to our colleague, the Honorable MARIO BIAGGI. The statements related to reported finding of conditions at Fort Dix, N.J., and are at variance with the facts as we found them to be upon official investigation.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the subcommittee which has previously been referred to by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. RANDALL), we interrogated stockade personnel and prisoners under oath. The story reported the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) as saying that heroin is readily available on the base. Heroin may be purchased on the base but at a price servicemen cannot afford and this accounts for some of the men going AWOL in order to obtain their requirements.

We concluded that heroin is no more a problem at Fort Dix than it is at any other place in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the newspaper article also quotes the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) as saying that there were 300 suicide attempts made each month at Fort Dix. The record shows that 300 suicide gestures are made annually at the post with an annual population of 300,000.

The newspaper report also states that one prisoner told the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) that he lost 40 pounds on disciplinary chow. I talked to this prisoner and asked him why he made that statement to Mr. BIAGGI after having been on the diet for only 48 hours. He said, "I was only kidding the Senator."

This disciplinary chow, Mr. Speaker, is prescribed only for those who are unresponsive to discipline. No prisoner may stay on the diet for more than 14 days at a time. He is checked daily by a physician.

Mr. Speaker, conditions at Fort Dix are not perfect or ideal but in my judgment are not such as to justify blanket indictment. After the subcommittee's brief visit I came to the conclusion that the men there are doing a responsible job under very trying conditions.

CONDITIONS AT FORT DIX

(Mr. HUNT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, I follow my two learned colleagues from the Subcommittee on Armed Services which investigates disorders on military bases. I was with the gentlemen at Fort Dix, N.J. who have spoken prior to me on November 1, 1969, and November 7, 1969, as the result of an article which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer in October 1969 attributed to remarks made by one of my colleagues and friends, Representative MARIO BIAGGI, of New York.

It just so happens that for 4 years I was the sheriff of Gloucester County, and I was the principal keeper of the county prison of Gloucester County. I am familiar with the operation of prisons—perhaps more so than anyone in the House, and as to its terminology and the so-called medieval conditions.

Mr. Speaker, the findings that we made at Fort Dix do not substantiate the facts carried in the paper under the greatest stretch of the imagination.

The so-called withdrawal symptoms of the gentleman who was in the stockade, Eugene Jackson by name, had passed. I might say that I also had the privilege for a good many years to have headed up a narcotics squad, and I therefore know whereof I speak.

I spoke to Eugene Jackson. He told me that he had been the user of marihuana in Vietnam for a number of months, and upon returning to the States had a leave of absence in New York City, where he was able to procure the heroin quite readily. It was in New York City, and not upon the base, that he contracted his addiction to heroin. Further, that while on leave up in New York City he went AWOL, and went from one bag of heroin to 10 bags of heroin a day. When it became so severe he turned himself in as an AWOL deserter. So that the story that the heroin was obtained on the base by Eugene Jackson was erroneous, and he admitted that this was not so.

NATIONAL FOOTBALL CAPITAL IS MIAMI, OKLA.

(Mr. EDMONDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, if any of those here today have any doubt about the location of the football capital of the United States, I would like to tell them a thing or two about Miami, Okla.

Miami is the city which produced Steve Owens. My colleagues from Oklahoma joined me here last week to advise you of Steve's outstanding career as a running back for the University of Oklahoma—a career which won him the Heisman Trophy awarded annually to the outstanding college football player in the country.

The good people of Miami had only begun to plan appropriate ceremonies to honor Steve on his homecoming when, last Friday night in Savannah, Ga., Northeastern Oklahoma A. & M. College won the national junior college football championship in a decisive 20 to 6 defeat of Arizona Western. And where is Northeastern Oklahoma A. & M. College located? Miami.

Plans are now firm for Steve Owens' homecoming. Next Monday, December 8, there will be a parade through Miami featuring Steve, his parents, and his charming wife. Monday night there will be a banquet, which was an instant sellout. In fact, the sponsors are looking for a larger hall to meet the demand for tickets.

I plan to be in Miami for Steve's parade and banquet, and I imagine I will have an opportunity to go back to Miami very soon for ceremonies honoring the magnificent Norsemen of Northeastern A. & M.

Steve Owens is Miami's first Heisman Trophy winner, but the citizens of Miami have experience in rolling out the carpet for the members and coaches of national junior college football championship teams. This is Northeastern's second national title in 3 years.

REQUEST FOR SPECIAL ORDER—FORT DIX STOCKADE CONDITIONS

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, this morning I was extended the invitation to be present and to act as an observer by the chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Armed Services, my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. RANDALL).

I have been here since he and my other two colleagues have testified.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a special order for 30 minutes to address the House today at the close of today's business so I can in fact deal with the facts as they are. On this issue, I will not back off.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PINKVILLE—THE ULTIMATE RESULT

(Mr. RARICK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, with the Pinkville incident surrounded by disproportionate press sensationalism, the same left which has consistently supported Hanoi now attempts to condemn and disgrace all U.S. fighting men.

If this were all we could expect, it would be atrocious enough punishment for men sent by their Government into a ghastly and unconventional "no win" war.

However, we can anticipate even more disastrous results. We must understand that not only these men but all U.S. military men will be in jeopardy of being considered "war criminals," exploited and propagandized by the enemy to justify its abuse of our captured fighting men—U.S. prisoners of war. Without the Geneva Convention protection requiring humane treatment, any American captured by the enemy can be branded as a "war criminal," imprisoned indefinitely, tried by his accusers, and possibly even executed.

Every American now in the hands of Communist forces is imperiled. Bertrand Russell and other European pinks are already demanding UNO "war crimes" trials of Americans.

Because much of the U.S. news media has presented Hanoi's propaganda as legitimate news—whether by design or merely motivated by greed—the American people can anticipate seeing an endless parade of their sons, as "war criminals," being subjected to any indignity the enemy can devise. And we can expect to hear the rationale for it repeated by the U.S. communications complex.

Soon every U.S. soldier—like our police officers—will need to check with a lawyer before firing his gun.

INCREASE IN CRIME

(Mr. CHAMBERLAIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material.)

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, during the past year or so we have heard much here in the Congress and throughout the land about the shocking increase in criminal activity. The situation, in many areas, has gotten so out of hand that nothing seems to surprise us any more. But this past weekend, when assailants undertook a shooting attack on the police headquarters and a fire station in Jackson, Mich., it would appear that we have reached a new plateau in the escalating violence. If a reminder is needed about the imperative importance of quick action to make the streets of our Nation safe, certainly there could probably be no better example than this.

I feel certain that my colleagues in both the House and Senate will not be surprised to learn that the city of Jackson has pending two applications under the Safe Streets Act. One project deals with the prevention of juvenile delinquency and the other with modernizing police communications equipment. A great many other communities throughout the country are confronted with the same problem of having to wait months for Federal help. Fiscal 1970 funds for this program are currently scheduled to go to conference within the next few days to resolve the differences between the House and Senate versions of the Department of Justice appropriation bill. I am therefore taking this opportunity to urge that the conferees accept the funds for the law enforcement assistance administration as recommended by the Senate in the amount of $275.5 million, which is some $25 million above the House-approved figure. No one questions, for a minute, that our Government is faced with a fiscal crisis aggravated by the problems of inflation. However, I submit the fight for safe streets in the face of spiraling crime rate cannot wait and that we here in the Congress must make every effort to see that adequate money is provided.

INCENTIVES FOR MILITARY LAWYERS' RETENTION

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 4296), to amend title 37, United States Code, to provide for the procurement and retention of judge advocates and law specialist officers for the Armed Forces.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the purpose of the bill?

Mr. PHILBIN. The purpose of H.R. 4296 is to insure the retention of adequate numbers of experienced lawyers in the uniformed services.

This purpose would be effected by providing military personnel performing judge advocate or law specialist duties with an increase in their monetary compensation.

The compensation increases authorized by this legislation provide:

First, a regular monthly payment of special pay ranging from $50 per month for a second lieutenant and captain, to $200 per month for lawyers in the grades of colonel and above; and

Second, a one-time lump-sum bonus to be offered to young lawyers who complete their active service obligation and who have less than 10 years of commissioned service.

This latter bonus, called a "continuation pay" bonus, would be payable at the rate of 2 months' basic pay for each additional year the young lawyer agrees to extend his active duty service commitment. The bill provides that the minimum additional obligation would be 3 years, with a maximum obligation of 6 years.

NECESSITY FOR THE LEGISLATION

Department of Defense witnesses strongly support this legislation. It was pointed out that the military has no difficulty in initially procuring the required number of young lawyers. This results because of the pressures of the draft. However, they are faced with a critical retention problem by virtue of their inability to retain on active duty experienced lawyers, once they have completed their obligated period of service.

This bill is therefore primarily designed to cope with this critical problem of retention.

FISCAL ASPECTS

The Department of Defense has advised the Committee on Armed Services that enactment of this legislation would result in annual estimated costs of approximately $7 million.

COMMITTEE POSITION

The Committee on Armed Services, a quorum being present, unanimously recommended enactment of H.R. 4296, as amended, and strongly urges approval of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GROSS. Have the military personnel in the judge advocate's division not participated in all the military pay increases?

Mr. PHILBIN. Yes, they have, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, but notwithstanding that fact they have been leaving and not reenlisting. We are up against the proposition now, in order to retain these experienced personnel, of a need to provide higher pay scales for them.

Mr. GROSS. What is the top increase?

Mr. PHILBIN. The increases range from $50 a month for a second lieutenant and $200 a month for the lawyer in the grade of colonel and above.

Mr. GROSS. How much?

Mr. PHILBIN. It is $50 a month for second lieutenants and captains, and $200 a month for colonels and higher ranks.

Mr. PIRNIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PIRNIE. I thank the gentleman, I understand the basis of his inquiry.

Just 4 months ago we established the Military Justice Act of 1968, which came into operation. Under its terms this Congress mandated certain additional burdens upon the Judge Advocate General Corps of the various services, requiring some 800 additional lawyers in uniform.

It has been found that the retention rates at the present time in the Army are 14 percent, in the Navy 11 percent, in the Marine Corps 5.1 percent, and in the Air Force 14 percent.

As the result of a study made over a period of years finally the Department of Defense came up with a recomendation that action had to be taken comparable to that taken with respect to doctors in the existing law in order to retain in the service people of professional legal competence to discharge these responsibilities being imposed upon them.

As a result of that need this legislation was drafted and is brought here today.

Mr. GROSS. This applies only to active-duty personnel; or does it apply equally to Reserve personnel?

Mr. PIRNIE. It applies only to people on active duty, both Reserve and Regular Army.

Mr. GROSS. But, with respect to reservists, only when called?

Mr. PIRNIE. Only when serving as a judge advocate on active duty.

Mr. GROSS. Is it true that the retention percentage figures the gentleman cited may have included some men who were drafted or otherwise serving temporarily who did not remain in the service, or are the percentages based upon active-duty personnel?

Mr. PIRNIE. They are computed after the period of obligation.

Mr. GROSS. Then the figures are based upon all those who come and go?

Mr. PIRNIE. It comprises those who are members of the corps.

I can answer the gentleman this way: a great many of them come in through Reserve status, ROTC, and they are finally commissioned in the Judge Advocate General Corps. They serve a period of 4 years. That is the period of their obligation. It is the retention beyond the obligated period that is computed in the figures I have just given.

This measure, which I introduced last January in anticipation of the effects of the Military Justice Act of 1968, is intended to do only one thing—provide a vehicle which will allow the armed services to compete successfully with the private and civilian government sectors for lawyers. It would do this by authorizing the Secretary of Defense to grant professional pay and a continuation bonus to military lawyers as retention incentives. The need for this type of compensation is clear, verified and immediate.

The undisputed fact is that our services have been and remain unable to retain sufficient military lawyers beyond the initial commitment obligation to carry out their assigned missions. In the Army only 14 percent of the young JAG's remain to the 5-year point and only 10 percent stay 10 years. The Air Force is retaining about 14 percent of its lawyers for a career but estimates that it needs a minimum of 45 percent in order to do its job properly. The Marine Corps has the worst retention rate of all—5.1 percent—and the Navy's 11 percent puts it in the desperate category. These are the realities of the problem. H.R. 4296 can provide the solution.

The remedy embodied in this legislation was not based on speculation but on a very thorough study by the Department of Defense which considered not only the reasons present JAG officers are resigning at alarming rates, but particularly why so many have left the services in the past 5 years. It was commissioned in August of 1967 in response to a growing awareness within DOD of the serious JAG retention problem. Its findings and recommendations are contained in a huge volume which was completed in October of last year. This comprehensive "Report on Military Lawyer Procurement, Utilization and Retention" made several recommendations including one calling for legislation authorizing professional pay and a continuation bonus for JAG's. H.R. 4296 embodies that recommendation and has been reported by the House Armed Services Committee with two minor amendments which were recommended by the Department of Defense.

Basically, it would authorize professional pay ranging from $50 to $200 per month for JAG officers and a continuation bonus payable at the rate of 2 months' basic pay for each year for which the JAG agreed to remain on active duty beyond any then outstanding active duty obligation or service commitment. The contract would be for a minimum of 3 and a maximum of 6 years and would be limited to those officers with 10 or fewer years of commissioned service. The purpose of the professional pay is to provide JAG officers with a regular monthly income more nearly commensurate with that enjoyed by their civilian contemporaries in the Federal Government, industry, and also private practice. The continuation bonus would be offered at the time when a young officer would be faced with the decision to resign or make a career of the service.

It should be made clear that this bill is designed not merely to obtain lawyers but to keep experienced ones. As a result, the major thrust of the remedy in this measure would operate at the point when the young officer concludes his initial obligation. At the end of this 4-year period, the young military lawyer is just coming into his own professionally. He is in the position to make a significant contribution either in the service or elsewhere because he has obtained the knowledge, judgment, and background only experience in the law can provide. Therefore, it is here that the major effort must be made to retain him, as the DOD study showed that it is at this career point that young JAG's are leaving the services.

The importance of experience in the law cannot be overemphasized. Those who have practiced can verify its value. However, more pertinent is the fact that the Military Justice Act of 1968 demands experienced attorneys in the JAG Corps. That law, in addition to requiring that the right-to-counsel guarantees in recent years extended to criminal defendants be afforded servicemen, also mandates that military judges preside over special as well as general courts-martial and insists that a bad conduct discharge not be adjudged by a special court-martial unless a military judge is detailed to the court. Do we want young recent law school graduates as military judges in such matters as bad conduct discharges, felonies and other serious military charges? Of course not. We must have mature lawyers who have experience to make vital judgments.

Yet, at the present time, we do not have them, and as the Department of Defense study concluded, the situation shows no evidence of improving. It ended with this grim forecast:

> Unless the trend . . . (of low retention rates) . . . is changed, the overwhelming majority of lawyers in uniform will be obligated tour officers recently out of law school who are in the service only as a result of the draft pressures.

With this prospect in view, the Department of Defense and the House Armed Services Committee recommended this legislation realizing that action must be taken now to solve this problem. We in the Congress mandated that a job be done and we have an obligation to provide the uniformed services with the tools needed to do it. We must keep faith with those of whom we have demanded greater service and more responsibility. H.R. 4296 is the fulfillment of that commitment.

As the Members of this body know, the legal arms of our services in the past year have faced mounting problems. They have encountered difficult situations from Presidio to Camp Lejeune, from Long Binh to Hawaii. They are tested at every turn and must, to do their jobs properly, have the cool and level-headedness only experience gives.

Today we consider legislation which will provide the necessary incentive to retain the young lawyer who has gained the experience our services so vitally need. It will make our services competitive with the private practice of the law and the civilian agencies of the government. It will help solve an immediate problem and may prevent a future one. It should insure that our service personnel receive the best possible legal advice and counsel. Finally, it will guarantee that our JAG Corps are filled with career lawyers interested in the military services, not merely law school graduates fulfilling their obligation. It is a sound approach which should be adopted.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

H.R. 4296

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, is amended by inserting the following new sections and corresponding items in the analysis:

"§ 302a. Special pay: judge advocates and law specialists

"(a) In addition to any other basic pay, special pay, incentive pay, or allowances to which he is entitled, each judge advocate of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, or law specialist of the Coast Guard, as defined in section 801 of title 10, other than one ordered to active duty for less than one year, is entitled to special pay at the rates set forth below while he is performing judge advocate duties—

"(1) $50 a month for each month of active duty, if he is in pay grade O 1, O 2, or O 3;

"(2) $150 a month for each month of active duty if he is in pay grade O 4 or O 5; or

"(3) $200 a month for each month of active duty, if he is in pay grade above O 5.

"(b) The amounts set forth in subsection (a) of this section may not be included in computing the amount of an increase in pay authorized by any other provision of this title or in computing retired pay or severance pay.

§ 311a. Special pay: continuation pay for judge advocates and law specialists who extend their service on active duty

"(a) Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary concerned, a judge advocate of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, or a law specialist of the Coast Guard, who—

"(1) is entitled to special pay under section 302a of this title;

"(2) has completed his initial active duty service commitment as a judge advocate or law specialist; and

"(3) executes a written agreement to remain on active duty for a period of at least three, but not more than six, additional years; may be paid not more than two months' basic pay at the rate applicable to him when he executes that agreement for each additional year that he agrees to remain on active duty. Pay under this section may, at the election of the officer, be paid to him in a lump sum at the beginning of the additional period or be prorated.

"(b) An officer who has received special pay under subsection (a) of this section may—

"(1) qualify for a second payment of that pay when he becomes eligible for voluntary retirement, with pay, upon completion of twenty years of active service, by executing a written agreement to remain on active duty for a period prescribed in that subsection; and

"(2) be paid on the same basis as prescribed in that subsection and at the rate of basic pay applicable to him at the time he executes the agreement.

"(c) An officer who does not serve on active duty for the entire period for which he was paid under this section shall refund that percentage of the payment that the unserved part of the period is of the total period for which the payment was made."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, is amended by inserting the following new sections and corresponding items in the analysis:

"'Sec. 302a. Special pay: judge advocates and law specialists

"'(a) In addition to any other basic pay, special pay, incentive pay or allowances to which he is entitled, each judge advocate of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, or law specialist of the Coast Guard, as defined in section 801 of title 10, other than one ordered to active duty for less than one year, is entitled to special pay at the rates set forth below while he is performing judge advocate duties—

"'(1) $50 a month for each month of active duty, if he is in pay grade O–1, O–2, or O–3;

"'(2) $150 a month for each month of active duty, if he is in pay grade O–4 or O–5; or

"'(3) $200 a month for each month of active duty, if he is in a pay grade above O–5.

"'(b) The amounts set forth in subsection (a) of this section may not be included in computing the amount of an increase in pay authorized by any other provision of this title or in computing retired pay or severance pay.

"'Sec. 311a. Special pay: continuation pay for judge advocates and law specialists who extend their service on active duty

"'(a) Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary concerned, a judge advocate of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, or a law specialist of the Coast Guard, who—

"'(1) is entitled to special pay under section 302a of this title;

"'(2) has completed his initial active duty service commitment as a judge advocate or law specialist and not more than 10 years of active service; and

"'(3) executes a written agreement to remain on active duty for a period of at least three, but not more than six, additional years; may be paid not more than two months' basic pay at the rate applicable to him when he executes that agreement for each additional year that he agrees to remain on active duty. Pay under this section shall be paid in equal annual or semiannual installments, as determined by the Secretary of the military department concerned in the case of a judge advocate or by the Secretary of the Department of Transportation in the case of a law specialist of the Coast Guard, in each additional year covered by a written agreement to remain on active duty. However, in meritorious cases the pay may be paid in fewer installments if the Secretary concerned determines it to be in the best interest of the judge advocate or law specialist.

"'(b) An officer who does not serve on active duty for the entire period for which he was paid under this section shall refund that percentage of the payment that the unserved part of the period is of the total period for which the payment was made.'"

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4296, which has been introduced and sponsored by my colleague, the Honorable ALEXANDER PIRNIE. I joined my colleague by sponsoring an identical bill, H.R. 8630.

It came as no great surprise that a Department of Defense study documented the existence of a critical, chronic retention problem regarding military lawyers. At a time when court decisions and the Military Justice Act of 1968—which became effective slightly over 3 months ago—are requiring that military personnel have available the services of a military lawyer in court-martial and related proceedings, it is distressing to learn that the military services have not only been operating with a shortage of career force lawyers, but that the number of experienced lawyers is so small and the retention rate of these specialized personnel is minuscle.

The DOD study found the career force in each of the military services to be operating with the following shortages: Army, 323; Navy, 170; Marine Corps, 112; Air Force, 132; and DOD-wide, 737.

The study found that the number of experienced lawyers in relation to the total force in fiscal 1970 will be as follows: Army, 29 percent; Navy, 36 percent; Marine Corps, 16 percent; Air Force, 42 percent; and DOD-wide, 35 percent. Furthermore, the trend is getting worse.

The Committee on Armed Services hearings on this legislation revealed that the retention rate of military lawyers in the Army is only 14 percent up to 5 years and 10 percent thereafter. The Navy retains 11 percent. The Marine Corps retains 5.1 percent. And the Air Force retains 4 percent.

The purpose of this bill is therefore to insure the retention of adequate numbers of experienced lawyers in the military services. This purpose will be effected by providing military personnel performing judge advocate or law specialist duties with an increase in monetary compensation. The Department of Defense after studying the problem and reviewing the budgetary impact, has supported the approach of this bill. The estimated first year cost for the bill would be $7 million.

The economic stimulus would be made available in two forms, first as the regular monthly payment of a special pay and second as a service continuation pay bonus. The special pay would give professional status to the lawyers comparable to that which is now accorded to the Medical and Dental Corps. It would mean special pay of $50 a month to the grades of second lieutenant, lieutenant, and captain. The service continuation bonus would be paid at a rate of 2 months' basic pay for each year for which the lawyer agrees to remain in an active service status beyond his existing active duty obligation.

This bill is not designed or intended as an example of favoritism toward lawyers. It is designed and intended to meet a very real and existing crisis. The impending change in the Selective Service System which would make the vulnerable draft age at about 19 may well mean that we will be able to draft fewer lawyers. There is really no provision for drafting lawyers at this time. If there were such a provision, there would be no crisis. Congress has mandated through the Military Justice Act that lawyers be made available. Now we have found it necessary to provide special incentives to keep available the lawyers now in service. I call upon my friends and colleagues to support this legislation. I would hope it can be speedily passed by the Congress and signed into law by the President.

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am certainly happy to add my strong support to the measure introduced by the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIRNIE), H.R. 4296. As sponsor of a companion bill, H.R. 9075, I am firmly convinced that this legislation is vital if we are to insure fair and prompt military justice. The problem of retaining adequate numbers of military lawyers has been growing for several years. The passage of the Military Justice Act of 1968, coupled with the decision of the U.S. Court of Military Appeals in the Tempia case has only accelerated the problem. A recent summary of retention rates indicates the scope of the problem:

RETENTION RATES FOR MILITARY LAWYERS

	Required rate per year (percent)	Actual rate per year (percent)	Numerical shortage in career force
Army	25	17	−323
Navy	30	8	−170
Air Force	45	4.5	−132
Marine Corps	25	3.6	−112

The bill before us would attack the problem from two standpoints. First, it would add to the monthly salary of military lawyers by means of the so-called "professional pay." This provision is in line with current practice in providing professional pay for doctors, dentists, and veterinarians. Professional pay in part compensates for the difference in pay realized by a professional man serving in the military. It certainly does not make private and military pay scale equal, or anywhere near it. It does, however, put the military in a position to more effectively bargain during those crucial first years out of law school. Of particular importance is the fact that this provision will allow effective competition with salaries offered to lawyers under the civil service salary schedule.

The second phase of the legislation deals with the problem which occurs when the military lawyer completes his initial period of obligated service. It is at this point the young lawyer, faced with a choice between the practice of law within the military, or civilian practice, is receiving increasingly tempting offers from the private sector. There has been a good deal of publicity on the salaries in excess of $15,000 now being offered to young law graduates.

To meet this phase of the problem, this legislation would provide a "continuation bonus" to those military lawyers who agreed to continue on active duty after completion of their obligated service. I feel that this approach will be a tremendous aid in retaining some of the fine young lawyers now in the various Judge Advocate Corps.

I might just remind my colleagues that we have adopted this approach as the solution to an identical problem in the submarine service. The Navy Department felt that its retention rate for nuclear sbmarine officers was critical in view of the fact it had, or was about to, drop to 40 percent. They felt very strongly that a continuation bonus plan would solve their problem. The high degree of acceptance of this approach to solution of this type of problem is emphasized by the unanimous endorsement that bill received, and the very rapid action taken on the bill here in the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it seems clear if continuation bonuses are the solution to retention problems in the Navy's submarine service where the retention rate is 40 percent, it certainly should be applied to the lawyers in that service who's retention rate is 8 percent.

If we are to carry out our commitment to a fair, impartial system of military justice, we must move promptly to insure an adequate supply of military lawyers. The urgency is heightened by the passage of the draft lottery legislation which will make recruitment of military lawyers even more difficult.

Through the Military Justice Act of 1968, we renewed our commitment to a high standard of justice in the military. This was certainly appropriate in view of the increasing protection afforded defendants in civilian criminal cases. Our servicemen are entitled to at least as high a caliber representation as is provided civilian criminal defendants. I am sure that many of my colleagues would be somewhat nervous about being represented in a court, military or civilian, by a veterinarian. This exact situation was revealed in a recent case in Federal court in Utah. The Federal court was reviewing, on writ of habeas corpus, an Army case where the defendant was represented by an Army veterinarian. By this comment I cast no aspersions on the abilities of veterinarians engaged in the practice of veterinary medicine for which they were trained.

At a time when our military services are under increasing attack by some segments of the public, we must be doubly certain that every member of the military service has available to him trained, competent military lawyers when he is charged with a violation of the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Likewise, that he can obtain a prompt, fair trial free from any influence of his superior officers.

I would urge prompt approval of this important legislation.

Mr. WHALEN. Mr. Speaker, as one of the cosponsors of H.R. 4296, I take this opportunity to urge its passage today.

This legislation, as reported by the Armed Services Committee, creates a "special pay" category for judge advocates and law specialists. H.R. 4296 provides an additional $50 per month for second lieutenants through captains, $150 per month for majors and lieutenant colonels, and $200 per month for colonels and above. Also incorporated in the measure is a "continuation pay" plan. A judge advocate who agrees to remain on active duty will be entitled to receive 2 months' basic pay for each year served beyond any then outstanding obligation or commitment. Such a contract for extension of service would require a minimum obligation of three additional years of service and a maximum obligation of 6 years.

Mr. Speaker, for 22 years officers in the medical and dental corps have received "special pay," which is often referred to as "professional pay." Since 1967, this group also has been granted "continuation pay." The enactment of these provisions for medical officers was prompted by the need to increase their retention rate to meet service personnel requirements.

Unfortunately, it is not possible to determine precisely how successful these monetary inducements have been in accomplishing that goal. Three other factors also have influenced medical retention rates. First, all newly licensed doctors must perform 2 years' military service. Second, a separate, accelerated promotion program has been made applicable to physicians. Third, assistance for medical education expenses is available in return for additional obligated service. Nevertheless, whatever the specific reason, the resignation rate of medical officers has been significantly reduced.

The critical situation which prompted the extensive revision of medical pay policies during the last two decades now confronts the judge advocate division of every branch of the Armed Forces. In July of this year, the Department of Defense stated that the legal career force is operating under shortages amounting to 323 in the Army, 170 in the Navy, 112 in the Marine Corps, and 132 in the Air Force. Should the present trend continue, by 1972 or 1975 the services will be operating their judicial systems with an inordinate number of lawyers who are recent law school graduates.

Mr. Speaker, while H.R. 4296 may not entirely resolve the retention problem, it is a first step toward retaining the lawyers required to insure a strong legal service within our Armed Forces. Thus, I hope that we in this House will begin today to work toward that goal by enacting this legislation.

Mr. TIERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4296, to provide for the procurement and retention of judge advocates and law specialist officers for the armed services. As a sponsor of identical legislation, I am aware of the need to insure the retention of an adequate number of experienced lawyers in the uniformed services.

It is difficult to state how many an adequate number is. However, presently the Department of Defense has a shortage of over 730 experienced military lawyers. As the General Counsel of the Defense Department stated:

> Failure to curb the current outflow of experienced lawyers could, within a few years, drastically impair the ability of those remaining military lawyers to provide necessary legal services within the Armed Services.

The major problem involved is that there is a very poor balance between experienced and inexperienced lawyers within the military. DOD statistics show that the problem grows worse by the year. H.R. 4296 is designed to create incentives that will maintain a career force on the desired experience level. There is no question as to the fairness of such incentives, for military physicians, dentists, and veterinarians presently receive additional compensation.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, there has been a lot of talk recently concerning GI rights. I contend that the passage of this bill and the subsequent increase in the number of experienced lawyers who remain in the uniformed services beyond their obligated tour of 4 years, will greatly enhance the opportunity for these GI rights to be recognized.

We have an opportunity today to help each and every serviceman as an individual. I urge that my colleagues join me in supporting H.R. 4296.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House has agreed to speedy consideration of H.R. 4296, to provide financial incentives for the retention of military lawyers.

As indicated in the report of the Committee on Armed Services, the military services are having no difficulty obtaining young lawyers fresh out of law school for a 4-year tour of duty. The pressure of the draft is enough to encourage law school graduates to enlist. However, after completing their initial obligation, for various reasons, most military lawyers are leaving the service. As a result, a serious experience gap has been created. The military lawyers are leaving just at the time they have reached a level of expertise that makes them especially valuable. They are then replaced by new, inexperienced officers who must again be upgraded to minimum proficiency. As this process continues, it is obvious that the experience and quality level of the overall Judge Advocate Corps must suffer.

At a time when our military justice system is coming under continued constitutional attack, it is especially important that the Congress provide incentives to retain our well-trained and experienced middle-level military lawyers.

H.R. 4296 provides two new methods of compensation for military attorneys. The first is a regular additional monthly payment ranging from $50 to $200 per month depending on grade. The second is the payment of a one-time bonus payable to military lawyers if they agree to continue in the service for a specified period after their initial obligation has been served. The bonus would be computed on the basis of 2 months' "base" pay for each year—3 to 6—that the attorney agrees to reenlist for.

It should be noted that the Congress has, in the past, utilized these methods of financial incentive with great success to encourage career retention of military professionals. At present, doctors, veterinarians, dentists, and certain nuclear-trained submarine officers receive special financial assistance. There is no question that these incentives have increased retention of professionals in these specialties. There is, further, no reason why this same method cannot be used to retain experienced military attorneys.

Mr. Speaker, I encourage my colleagues to support this measure for two basic reasons. First, as a matter of financial equity for military lawyers. Second, and much more importantly, to alleviate a serious professional deficiency in the legal ranks of our military services.

Mr. DENNEY. Mr. Speaker, consideration of the subject now before the House, professional pay for military lawyers, is long overdue. It is quite common for us to talk in terms of "critical shortages" or "crisis conditions," but those trite phrases still seem in order today.

A Department of Defense study group has determined that there exists an alarming 737-person shortage in career lawyers in the military services. In effect, this determination means that what is needed for our Armed Forces to effectively maintain legal services is another 737 experienced lawyers, those who have stayed on after their initial obligated tour.

In the past several years, this body has asked military lawyers to play an increasing role in our total judicial system. The Military Justice Act is an outstanding example of the added responsibility entrusted to these officers and specialists. Individual rights of servicemen have been expanded, and the military lawyer is the vanguard for their protection.

We have placed added responsibilities on the services; now let us pass the necessary legislation to insure their able administration.

Likewise, judicial activity has placed a great burden on the already understaffed legal corps. O'Callahan against Parker promises to increase their activities in determining jurisdiction in new cases and relief where final cases are reconsidered.

As any lawyer knows, experience is vital in adequately giving legal counsel to a client. With the shortage of experienced personnel mentioned earlier, and the increased need for expert advice, it is evident that we must make a strong effort to retain young lawyers and thereby increase the percentage of seasoned lawyers to total attorneys in service.

During an investigation of this problem, I ran across some floor comments made over 20 years ago when this same problem was being debated with respect to professional pay for medical doctors and dentists.

The same solution presented now, professional pay, was offered in these words by Congressman Blackney from Michigan:

> Everyone knows that we live in a chaotic age; that the international situation is extremely acute and, therefore, the maintenance of our Army and Navy is a No. 1 problem to our Nation and to the citizens at large. In order to maintain properly such an Army and Navy, it is highly essential that the Medical Corps of the groups should be maintained at the highest degree of efficiency. No father or mother, no Congressman, or no thinking person, wants to send the boys into service unless they are assured in advance that they will have full, complete, and efficient medical attention. That is the reason why this bill becomes so important.
> The scarcity of physicians, surgeons, and dentists in our armed forces is alarming. The financial attractions of civilian life to physicians, surgeons, and dentists have induced many professional men, who were formerly in service, to retire to private life and it now becomes apparent that some inducement be offered to those groups in the armed forces in order to secure and retain their services therein.

Then, as now, the necessity of offering experienced professional assistance to our military men was recognized. Then the necessity was met by wise congressional action and professional pay was authorized for doctors and dentists to keep them in the service.

I hope that the House chooses that same wise course today.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I rise support of H.R. 4296, a measure designed to provide an incentive to obtain and retain an adequate number of experienced lawyers in our military services.

In April 1967, the Journal of the Armed Forces carried an article on the increasing difficulty the Armed Forces—all branches—were experiencing in retaining a sufficient number of law specialists and judge advocates. "As a result," the article reported, "much of the legal workload of the services is being handled by young and relatively untried officers whose diplomas still smell of wet ink." In a word, recent law school graduates are willing to serve a 4-year period in our Armed Forces, but then civilian life—and civilian pay—attracts them.

Prompted by this report, the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIRNIE), the author of the proposal before us, did some research. He learned that, in 1968, the Army's retention rate for military lawyers was 12½ percent, the Navy's 12 percent, and the Air Force's 19 percent.

These facts alone are disturbing, but another factor must be taken into consideration. Last year, Congress wisely enacted the Military Justice Act, intending to extend to our service men and women the right-to-counsel safeguards which the Supreme Court has guaranteed to civilians. This means, of course, that our needs for qualified and experienced lawyers in the military will rapidly multiply.

For these reasons, I joined sponsorship of a bill identical to H.R. 4296 as originally introduced.

Since that introduction, the findings on which it was based have been substantiated by a study conducted by the Department of Defense, which recommends enactment of H.R. 4296 with the amendments approved by the Armed Services Committee.

As reported to the House by the committee, this bill would make a special regular monthly payment to our military lawyers, thus providing them with an income that compares more favorably to that which they could earn in civilian life. Professional pay such as this is now paid, as you know, to doctors, dentists, and veterinarians. Similarly, special pay—that is, proficiency pay—is authorized by law for enlisted personnel with specialized occupations.

This bill would also provide the payment of a bonus for military lawyers who agree to extend their service for at least 3 years beyond their original commitment. Bonus payments of this kind are now paid to physicians and others with expertise in various fields. As suggested by the DOD, the bonus would be payable only once in a military lawyer's career.

If we are to provide the men and women of this Nation who serve in our military with the legal services to which they are entitled, I believe that we must take this step to encourage lawyers to make a career of the military.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. Speaker, as the introducer of H.R. 10463, a similar bill, I rise in support of H.R. 4296, which was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. PIRNIE).

I would like to commend the gentleman from New York for recognizing the gravity of the military lawyer retention problem, and I would also like to commend our Committee on Armed Services for its early favorable consideration of this legislation which offers an acceptable solution to that problem.

The Department of Defense describes the situation involving military lawyers as "a critical, chronic retention problem." Unless the current outflow of experienced lawyers is curbed, the Department foresees a time, only a few years hence, when the ability of the remaining military lawyers to provide necessary legal services within the Armed Forces will be "drastically" impaired.

Even if the situation described by the Department of Defense in its report to the chairman of our Committee on Armed Services is a projected one, clearly, present conditions, if unchecked, will lead us inevitably to it. It is imperative, therefore, that we take action now to reverse the trend.

We need only to examine the Department's own figures to be convinced that the Congress must act quickly to retain experienced military lawyers and also to attract younger lawyers to the military service. From the standpoint of the number of experienced military lawyers needed to render legal services of the proper quality, the career force in each of the military services is presently operating with these shortages: Army, 323; Navy, 170; Marine Corps, 112; Air Force, 132.

The ratio between experienced and inexperienced lawyers gives rise to even greater concern. At the beginning of fiscal year 1970, the number of experienced lawyers in relation to the total number of lawyers in each branch of the Armed Forces was reported to be as small as 29 percent in the Army; 36 percent in the Navy; 16 percent in the Marine Corps; and 42 percent in the Air Force.

Mr. Speaker, the military lawyer retention problem has grown to such serious proportions that additional financial incentives are urgently needed to assure our men in uniform that they will continue to receive proper legal counsel and representation. H.R. 4296, as amended by the committee, would provide such financial incentives in the form of professional pay and a continuation bonus. At the highest level, pay grade O–6 and above, military lawyers, who generally will have had 20 or more years of active service, would receive $200 per month. At the O–3 pay-grade level and below, the special pay would be $50 per month.

In addition, a continuation bonus would be payable to all military lawyers, with 10 or fewer years of commissioned service, who extend their service on active duty upon completion of their initial active service commitment as a judge advocate or law specialist. He must execute a written agreement to remain on active duty for a period of at least 3, but not more than 6, additional years. This continuation pay bonus would be divided into equal annual or semiannual installments and would be paid over the period of the extended service as agreed upon by the military lawyer. His continuation bonus would be computed at the time he signs the agreement on the basis of not more than 2 months' basic pay for each additional year of extended active duty.

The Department of Defense has estimated the first year costs of these financial incentives at $7 million, and subsequent annual costs would not be expected to exceed this amount.

The costs involved appear to be reasonable in view of the critical nature of the retention problem with respect to military lawyers. By extending these career retention incentives to military lawyers, we would be assured that our servicemen would have available the quality of legal assistance to which they are entitled. Denial of this assistance would mean a denial of justice under the law to our servicemen.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4296 deserves our unanimous vote.

Mr. POLLOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4296, a bill to provide for the procurement and retention of judge advocates and law specialist officers. Specifically, this legislation authorizes special pay for judge advocates and law specialists and also provides for the payment of a continuation pay bonus to those legal officers with not more than 10 years of active service who reenlist upon the completion of their initial active duty commitment.

The necessity for legislation such as H.R. 4296 cannot be overemphasized. At the present time, the Department of Defense is confronted with a critical retention problem which exists with respect to its military lawyers. No major problems are encountered in the initial procurement of junior legal officers, for pressures generated by the Selective Service laws produce an adequate number of applicants. However, great difficulties are encountered in retaining seasoned military lawyers beyond the period of their initial obligation.

This retention problem is graphically illustrated by statistical data compiled in 1968 by the Department of Defense. These findings show that each of the four services suffer severe shortages in their career forces of military lawyers. Thus, for example, the Army is lacking 323 career lawyers and the Navy, 170. As a result of these shortages, the ratio of experienced lawyers to the total number of lawyers is surprisingly low in each of the four services, with the Department of Defense-wide average a low 35 percent. Far from improving, it is expected that this imbalance will worsen in the absence of remedial legislation. As the number of experienced lawyers in the armed services diminishes, we can reasonably expect to find a loss of continuity in many armed services legal projects.

To maintain a career force of the desired experience, adequate numbers of junior officers must be attracted into the career group. Yet, the figures show that this is not occurring. The Navy retains only 10 percent of its legal officers beyond the mandatory 4 year obligation and the Air Force, 14.5 percent.

In considering whether additional financial incentives are necessary in order to retain military lawyers, it is important to note that financial incentives have been used successfully to solve retention problems in other critical professional areas. Thus, for example, both military dentists and doctors receive additional compensation ranging from $100 to $350 per month. Moreover, military physicians receive a continuation bonus similar to the one proposed in H.R. 4296. Other finanical incentives, such as reenlistment bonuses, are also offered.

The conclusion is inescapable that a severe problem exists with regard to the retention of military lawyers. We have before us today a solution which has proven successful in alleviating the shortage of professional personnel in several other critical areas. The Department of Defense believes that a similar program of financial incentives is necessary to retain skilled legal counsel; the Bureau of the Budget concurs in this judgment. The cost—$9.9 million—is not prohibitive when compared to the magnitude of the problem. For these reasons, I respectfully urge this distinguished body to give its careful consideration to the immediate passage of H.R. 4296. This legislation is essential if the legal divisions of each of our military services are to continue to perform their functions with the efficiency and skill that we have learned to expect from them.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4296 which would provide professional pay and a continuation bonus for military lawyers, a companion bill to one which I introduced earlier in the session.

Having helped author H.R. 6555—90th—the proposed Military Personnel Legal Counsel Act, and having supported the Military Justice Act of 1968, I naturally became actively interested in the quality of military justice.

I was very glad that the 90th Congress renewed its promise for providing our men in uniform with a truly just military system; however, I became quite dismayed by the alarming statistics indicating that while there was a greater need for military lawyers, the retention rate of military lawyers was critically low. A comprehensive Department of Defense study completed in October 1968 of military lawyer procurement, utilization, and retention very definitely afforded statistics in this area pointing to a shortage of manpower and an "unsafe" imbalance between the experienced and inexperienced lawyers.

This problem has resulted because of a lack of career retention incentives that are now furnished to physicians, dentists, and veterinarians, but not lawyers. After a 4-year obligation tour, the military lawyer realizes that he cannot afford to stay in the military. If he leaves the military, he is almost guaranteed to earn approximately $5,000 more a year. Is it no wonder that there is a critical shortage of JAG's?

The Department of Defense has recognized the criticality of the retention problem, and, thus, has recommended enactment of the proposed legislation, H.R. 4296. The "continuation pay" bonus would be payable when the officer would normally be required to make a decision to continue as a career officer in the military service or return to civilian life—with 10 or fewer years of service. A "special pay" would more nearly commensurate with salaries enjoyed by civilian contemporaries.

The obvious need for legislation in this area is squarely met by H.R. 4296, and accordingly, I strongly urge its prompt enactment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR HOUSE MANAGERS TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 14159

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers on the part of the House may have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the bill (H.R. 14159) making appropriations for public works for water, pollution control, and power development, including the Corps of Engineers—Civil, the Panama Canal, the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, the Bureau of Reclamation, power agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Atomic Energy Commission, and related independent agencies and commissions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1970, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

OIL DEPLETION ALLOWANCE

(Mr. VANIK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I was chagrined at the action of the Senate in increasing the oil depletion allowance to 23 percent. Since the average utilization of the depletion allowance has been at the 23-percent level, this action represents a complete capitulation to the powerful oil interests.

The continuation of the depletion allowance on foreign oil further substantiates the political power of oil.

There is no rational legislative reason for extending the privilege of the depletion allowance to foreign produced oil. The combination of the depletion allowance and the foreign tax credit have made most of these profits tax free.

These tax-free profits of American investment in foreign oil have corrupted and misdirected American foreign policy in many oil-rich countries. This has resulted in American policies of costly military assistance to absolute monarchs and dictators. There is no reason for the American taxpayer to subsidize these activities.

It is now incumbent upon the House conferees, backed by an overwhelming vote in the House of Representatives to insist on the House provisions which eliminated the foreign depletion allowance on oil and reduced the domestic depletion allowance to 20 percent.

By its action, the oil industry has jeopardized the tax bill and has set the stage for another reform debate in the next Congress. Things may be different the next time around when the taxpayer discovers how he has been done in.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Mr. DERWINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, communications—farflung, speedy communications—are the pulsebeat of our modern society. Our success in the far reaches of space, our lifeline here on earth to our scattered national efforts throughout the world, are dependent on fast and accurate communication. Peace may depend ultimately on a microwave.

Yet here at the citizen and business level our communications system is slowing down and showing grave danger of failing utterly. The number of users of our postal system grows monthly; the efficiency of the service slips and drags a little more as it does.

Today, we are locked in by custom and tradition to a creaky, outmoded system of postal service. What we need is a businesslike approach and the most modern methods for handling the mail. A new system, not fettered by partisan politics or hidebound by "gaslight era" methods is needed and is needed soon. President Nixon in his message of October 13 delineated the reform steps to be taken to modernize our postal system. In the name of commonsense, let us take them before it is too late.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

MRS. IRENE G. QUEJA

The Clerk called the bill (S. 564) for the relief of Mrs. Irene G. Queja.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

S. 564

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in the administration of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Mrs. Irene G. Queja shall be held and considered to be within the purview of section 203(a)(2) of that Act and the provisions of section 204 of the said Act shall not be applicable in this case.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. Speaker, as the introducer of a companion bill, H.R. 1801, I rise in support of S. 564, a private bill which would preserve second preference status in behalf of a lawful permanent resident of the United States.

Irene G. Queja, the widow, is a 31-year-old native and citizen of the Philippines. She was married there on November 13, 1967, to Ireneo D. Queja, a lawful permanent resident of the United States since 1930. Mr. Queja returned to Hawaii and filed a second preference visa in behalf of the beneficiary on December 8, 1967. Mrs. Queja intended to apply for a permanent resident visa and join her husband in Hawaii in July 1968, but her husband died of a heart attack in Honolulu on June 3, 1968.

The beneficiary was admitted at Honolulu, Hawaii, as a nonimmigrant visitor for the purpose of attending her husband's funeral. I introduced private bill H.R. 19590 on September 5, 1968, in behalf of the widow, and reintroduced the bill on the opening day of the 91st Congress.

The beneficiary, who has no children and was married but once, is presently living with a widowed female cousin in Honolulu. A high school graduate in her native country, the beneficiary worked approximately 4 years as a restaurant cashier before her marriage. She has savings in excess of $7,500, and plans to seek employment in Honolulu after her status has been adjusted to that of a permanent resident.

Mr. Speaker, the beneficiary is a person of good moral character and hopes eventually to have the honor and the privilege of becoming a citizen of the United States.

The other body has obviously concluded that there is considerable merit to this widow's plea. I urge that this House give S. 564 the same favorable consideration.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FAVORING THE SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) favoring the suspension of deportation of certain aliens.

There was no objection.

MILOYE M. SOKITCH

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3571) for the relief of Miloye M. Sokitch.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3571

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any provisions of title III of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949, as amended, limiting the period within which claims may be filed thereunder, including section 316 of such Act (22 U.S.C. 1641o), the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission of the United States is authorized and directed (1) to receive, consider, and act upon any claims of Miloye M. Sokitch, of Washington, District of Columbia, or his legal representative, filed within six months after the date of enactment of this Act, against the Government of Italy, as if such claims had been filed within the time and manner provided in the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949, and (2) to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment out of remaining balances in the Italian claims fund any award issued pursuant to such claims. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the said Miloye M. Sokitch or his legal representative out of such fund, in accordance with the provisions of section 310 of such Act (22 U.S.C. 1641i), the amount of any such award so certified by the Commission. Nothing in this Act shall constitute an admission of liability on the part of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN T. ANDERSON

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 2241) for the relief of John T. Anderson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 2241

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $137.50 to John T. Anderson of Morris Plains, New Jersey, in full settlement of his claim against the United States for the cost of shipping his automobile, incident to his separation from the Department of the Air Force, from Bremerhaven, Germany, to Baltimore, Maryland, in 1962. Such shipping costs were incurred after an officer of the United States Army Transportation Corps erroneously refused to authorize shipment of such automobile on a Government vessel.

SEC. 2. No part of the amount appropriated in this Act in excess of 10 per centum thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with such claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 4: Strike "in excess of 10 per centum thereof".

THOMAS J. CONDON

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 9092) for the relief of Thomas J. Condon.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

H.R. 9092

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas J. Condon, East Weymouth, Massachusetts, letter carrier at the United States post office, Hingham, Massachusetts, a sum which the Postmaster General shall certify to the Secretary as the amount of additional compensation to which the said Thomas J. Condon would have been entitled from October 1, 1946, to January 1, 1948, if he had been placed on October 1, 1946, in the appropriate salary grade at the appropriate rate of compensation in accordance with the Act of July 31, 1946 (60 Stat. 749; Public Law 577, Seventy-ninth Congress). Through administrative error, which was corrected on January 1, 1948, the said Thomas J. Condon was placed in an inappropriate grade at an inappropriate rate of compensation for such period. No part of the amount appropriated in this Act in excess of 10 per centum thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this Act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Page 2, line 4, after "gress" insert: "as amended by the Act of April 29, 1950 (64 Stat. 93; Public Law 492, 81st Congress").

Page 2, line 8, strike "in excess of 10 per centum thereof".

Page 2, line 15, after "$1,000." insert: "The amount authorized to be paid to the said Thomas J. Condon by this Act shall be reduced by the amount which should have been deducted as the employee's contribution to the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund for that period, and the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to deposit that amount in the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund to the credit of the said Thomas J. Condon."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WALTER L. PARKER

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 10662) for the relief of Walter L. Parker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 10662

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Walter L. Parker of Trenton, New Jersey, is relieved of liability to the United States in the amount of $278.87 representing overpayments of salary paid to him during the period from January 20, 1966, through October 31, 1967, by the Department of the Navy as a result of administrative error and through no fault of his own. In the audit and settlement of the accounts of any certifying or disbursing officer of the United States, credit shall be given for amounts for which liability is relieved by this section.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike "$278.87" and insert "$279.05".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RUSSELL L. CHANDLER

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 12622) for the relief of Russell L. Chandler.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 12622

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Russell L. Chandler, an employee of the National Aeronautical and Space Administration, formerly of Huntsville, Alabama, who was ordered to report for duty at his new duty station in Washington, District of Columbia, on September 18, 1966, for relocation allowances authorized by the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 806), in accordance with the provisions of the regulations of the Bureau of the Budget contained in Circular Numbered A–56 Revised, October 12, 1966, except that the time limits contained in section 4.1d of the circular will not be applied to expenses incurred within six months of the date of the enactment of this Act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after "appropriated", insert "a sum not to exceed $724.65".

Page 2, lines 3, 4, and 5, strike "will not be applied to expenses incurred within six months of the date of the enactment of this Act." and insert "will not be applied to expenses incurred in connection with said relocation prior to the enactment of this Act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CAPT. NORMAN W. STANLEY

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1728) for the relief of Capt. Norman W. Stanley.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 1728

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Captain Norman W. Stanley of San Jose, California, is hereby relieved of liability to the United States in the amount of $2,371.44, representing overpayments of salary from September 18, 1961, through March 17, 1966, paid to him as a member of the United States Air Force as the result of an administrative error which occurred without fault on his part. In the audit and settlement of the accounts of any certifying or disbursing officer of the United States, full credit shall be given for the amount for which liability is relieved by this Act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the said Captain Norman W. Stanley the sum of any amounts received or withheld from him on account of the overpayments referred to in the first section of this Act. No part of the amount appropriated in this Act in excess of 10 per centum thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with such claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, lines 8 and 9, strike "in excess of 10 per centum thereof".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That concludes the call of the Private Calendar.

TOWARD PEACE WITH JUSTICE IN VIETNAM

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of House Resolution 613, toward peace with justice in Vietnam.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of House Resolution 613, with Mr. FLYNT in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on yesterday, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) had 1 hour and 26 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. ADAIR) had 1 hour and 28 minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILBERT).

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am voting against House Resolution 613, but not because I oppose a "just peace" in Vietnam. What I oppose is the implication of this resolution and the method by which its sponsors have sought to impose it on the House.

There is probably not one of us in this body, Mr. Chairman, who does not favor a "just peace." I am equally sure that President Nixon seeks a "just peace." But one man's "just peace" is another man's "sell-out" and still a third man's military victory. The sponsors of this resolution surely understand that fair-minded, reasonable men differ enormously on what constitutes a "just peace." President Nixon appears to feel that a "just peace" would not include a coalition government. I feel that a coalition government is the bare minimum for a "just peace."

I cannot vote for this resolution, for we have precedents on how an administration can take the words of Congress and impart to them a meaning that was never intended. Can a President of the United States interpret an affirmative vote on this resolution as a sanction for whatever negotiating tactic he chooses to adopt, including the indefinite prolongation of the war? I hope that the answer is negative. But an earlier President took a resolution of the Senate to mean a virtual declaration of war against North Vietnam—an intent which was far removed from the minds of its sponsors. Once the resolution was voted, however, it was no longer in the hands of the Senate, but, for all practical purposes, the property of the administration, to use in the manner that suited its purposes. I am not at all assured by the sponsors of House Resolution 613 that the same fate does not await this resolution. Surely the enthusiasm the President has shown for it, in taking the unprecedented step of speaking on the floor of this Chamber in its behalf, does not suggest that the resolution will be treated with diffidence and restraint.

I further object, as part of the overall pattern which this resolution has followed, to the manner in which the matter has come to us. I see this measure as an excellent vehicle by which the Committee on Foreign Affairs might have questioned the administration on its war policy and its peace policy. We might have learned a great deal from the experience and the country would have had the opportunity to grasp so much more about our Nation's commitment in Vietnam. But, on the contrary, no hearings were set. Neither a member of the administration nor a sponsor of the bill spoke on it in committee. It was in closed session, the proceedings of which we know very little, that the resolution was sent to the floor. At least a committee hearing might have enabled my colleagues and me to find out, in some reasonably accurate fashion, what substance this resolution is intended to convey.

I further can find no sanction for sending this bill to the floor under a closed rule. Surely there are Members who could clarify the resolution by amendment. There are others who believe the sense of this body could be more precisely expressed if the resolution were amended. The process leads me to wonder why its sponsors fear to have this resolution touched. Is it sacred in its present form? Is it meant, in these words, to convey a degree of support to the President which no other words could achieve? I would myself seek to amend the resolution to express the preference of Congress for a more representative government in South Vietnam. Certainly the House would not oppose such a sentiment, so much in keeping with the democratic aims of our involvement in South Vietnam.

Mr. Chairman, I think we will one day be sorry for the passage of this resolution. I believe it attempts to create the impression of a national unity that does not exist—and that the world knows does not exist. We are deluding neither allies nor foes, but ourselves, if we proclaim passage of this resolution as an expression of national unity. We will achieve national unity when the President ceases to cater to every whim of the current Saigon regime and we negotiate a peace that recognizes the realities of Vietnamese political life. I see no reason to believe that passage of this resolution will strengthen our bargaining position in Paris, any more than it will strengthen our millitary position on the battlefields of the delta. I think it is unworthy of this great body that we dispose of the major questions facing our country in such a fashion. For these reasons, I cannot support this resolution.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. RARICK).

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Chairman, I voted "no" on both the previous question and on the adoption of the rule for House Resolution 613. I have consistently held that the American people are entitled to victory in Vietnam. My conviction is unchanged.

The Vietnam resolution which we now consider conveys great nobility of purpose in calling for broad popular support for the President in his efforts to obtain a just peace in Vietnam. The endeavor here undertaken will prove to involve more than a mere confrontation between popular support for the President and the demands for immediate unilateral withdrawal.

As with any question there are always more than two alternatives.

Most Americans support what they understand to be the President's objectives in Vietnam—a termination of the hostilities as speedily as possible, consistent with our national interests. But many do not necessarily agree with the wisdom of the course which has been chosen—that of negotiating with an undefeated enemy. The best and most certain method to terminate the war promptly and permanently, while discouraging any further such aggressive ventures, is to win it. Hanoi knows this. We should.

Mr. Chairman, this is a popular resolution with most. I have not the slightest doubt that it will pass by a great margin. Yet, I feel compelled to rise and give voice to the viewpoint of many other dedicated Americans who feel as I do on victory.

The real question before us is whether enactment of this resolution would be instrumental in regaining peace, or might it have the unintended result of placing our country in an impassé by severely restricting our President's future alternatives.

Approval of this resolution endorses negotiation and can be interpreted by the President and, more importantly, by the enemy as an instruction to pursue only that course. Thus, we can find ourselves bogged down in endless negotiations over trivia while countless Americans continue to be slaughtered unnecessarily.

When former President Lyndon Johnson stopped the bombing, which was actually hurting the enemy, and began negotiating we spent months in Paris negotiating simply to decide the shape of the conference table. How many American lives did this talk cost? Only yesterday, General Westmoreland, Army Chief of Staff and former commander in Vietnam, stated that had the bombing not been stopped the war would have ended last year. How many American lives did stopping the bombing cost? What was accomplished?

This resolution calls for further endless negotiations. How long would it take in negotiations to arrive at agreement over the definition of such terms as "free elections", "open to all", "supervised", "by an impartial international body."

Each word of this resolution is an open invitation to protracted and fruitless discussions in Paris while Americans continue to die in Vietnam and Hanoi's dear American friends escalate operations in the United States.

Have we learned nothing from our recent history in the Korean debacle? In Korea our men fought—and still die—under the UNO flag, in an UNO declared war against Communist China. There has been no peace settlement negotiated—and there is no peace. There is only an uneasy cease-fire where American men—who were not even born when the Korean war broke out—die as we continue to talk at Panmunjom.

Mr. Chairman, passage of this resolution will find 1970 without peace, more talk-fests, with more American casualties and more Americans yet to be killed, disabled or fall prisoner.

Every American surely recognizes that we have been brought to the present stalemate because we bent over backward to appease, negotiate and talk. Passage of the resolution is tantamount to approval by this body of past failures—policies that have left us 40,000 dead and 300,000 other casualties—policies which were resoundingly repudiated by the American citizens at the polls just last November. We accomplish nothing by attempting to renovate the same bankrupt Johnson policy.

It is time for a change. It is time to pursue a different course. The proven path to peace we have never tried in Vietnam is declaring a positive objective and moving forward to peace through victory.

The American people understand, even if their leaders do not, that you do not end violence by negotiating with criminals. This applies to the international terrorists in Hanoi as well as it does to the domestic type in our cities. Negotiation leads only to appeasement, which leads only to surrender. Surrender invites further violence—making an endless circle.

The people of my district are also opposed to the way this war is being conducted. They did not believe in the namby-pamby UNO diplomacy that got us involved in it in the first place, but now that we are in it, they are strongly opposed to prolonging it. They cannot understand why their sons are sent to fight a dirty little Asian war and are forbidden to win.

It would have been better had this resolution remained in committee. Now that it is before us on a "yes or no" vote, the lesser of the two evils is probably its adoption, if for no other reason than the propaganda value to Hanoi of its defeat. We can well expect the Washington newspapers to claim its adoption as a dove victory because it calls for additional negotiations.

In the long run its effect is to strengthen Hanoi's negotiators, not support our President.

By this instrument we state formally our concessions and severely restrict our flexibility in negotiation. Would it not be of value for us to possess the published instructions given Hanoi's negotiators by their government? We may find to our great regret that this resolution has left us only the formality of surrender.

Yet, this resolution will pass by a lopsided vote. This is not because it has any real meaning, or any intrinsic value. It is simply because Members have been neatly boxed into an impossible position—the same as they were with the former Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Emotion overrules logic.

Many of the Members of this body had voted, in good faith, in favor of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution and came to regret it. They found that the resolution was far more encompassing than they had intended. In voting for this Vietnam resolution, many more Members will find themselves in February making the same apologies, for essentially the same reasons. And it is well to remember that these debates will not be carried in the future newspaper analyses—only selected language from the resolution.

It would be easy to remain silent, vote with the majority, and evade the real issue. I do not propose to do so. I cannot, in conscience, support the present resolution, neither can I cast a vote which will be interpreted by the controlled news media as support for the enemy. I shall, therefore, vote "present."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. ADAIR).

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. TAFT).

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, in keeping with the unanimous consent previously granted, I would like to insert in the RECORD preceding the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio a telegram from George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, and a telegram from Walter H. Judd, a former Member of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 1, 1969.

Hon. JAMES WRIGHT,
Washington, D.C.:

The policies concerning Vietnam set forth in House Resolution 613 closely parallel those the AFL–CIO has adopted in convention resolutions and executive council statements. We strongly urge its adoption.

GEORGE MEANY,
President, AFL–CIO.

DENVER, COLO., December 1, 1969.

Hon. JAMES WRIGHT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

Strongly approve your resolution expressing support of the President's efforts to get justice and freedom for the people of South Vietnam without which no peace can be honorable or lasting for Southeast Asia or for our own country.

Best regards,

WALTER H. JUDD.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this resolution and wish to call the attention of the Committee to some information which I do not believe has come to their attention previously.

First, with regard to the general feeling of the American people on this very difficult problem that we are faced with in Vietnam, I would like to report the results of a questionnaire which I distributed on a postal patron basis to my district, some 140,000 copies in late September, and on which I have now had returned over 20,000 copies with the following results.

The questions which I asked were:

Which statement most accurately describes your sentiments regarding a Vietnam settlement?

In reply to that the answer was as follows: On the question and on the alternatives that I put:

(a) The United States should apply whatever military pressure is necessary to end the fighting and assure a stable and secure non-Communist government. 33%.

(c) The United States should continue the policy of withdrawal of American troops, begun in June, 1969, relating it to the war's progress and peace negotiations. 36%.

Thus, we find a total of some 69 percent are in support of the President's position, or of a stronger position.

On the other side, we find the next question:

(b) The United States should begin at once a complete withdrawal of American troops to be carried out regardless of the progress of the war. 18%.

This lines up almost directly, I would point out, to the results of a Gallup poll recently, and it seems to verify that finding.

There were other answers in the area of forcing a Communist coalition only with the Communists, only 3 percent.

Others and no answers—in the neighborhood of 10 percent.

This, I think, does indicate a gain from my particular constituency, the general feeling and general support of the people which I think we are reaffirming and reexpressing in this resolution.

Also I would like to call the attention of the House to a statement made by Ambassador Lodge on November 13 as his opening statement in the plenary session in Paris on that day.

In part he said as follows:

We have not put forth our proposals on a take-it-or-leave-it basis—

Quoting the President—

We have declared that anything is negotiable except the right of the people of South Viet-Nam to determine their own future.

Then he proceeds:

We ask you to join us in serious negotiations because we wish: to see this war ended; to spare the brave people of South Viet-Nam further suffering; to save the lives of our soldiers; and to end this waste of so many North Vietnamese troops, whose courage entitles them to a better fate. If progress at these talks is not possible, we can continue with our plan under which we will withdraw our forces from South Viet-Nam on an orderly scheduled timetable in accordance with the three criteria we have mentioned before.

Then he proceeds with reference to this particular resolution which is before the House today as follows:

Yesterday, a remarkable expression of this support took place—

American people for a just peace. And continuing—

Referring to the wide support of the Members of the House of Representatives cosponsored and signed a House Resolution. I will read the text of the resolution.

Then Ambassador Lodge read the very text of the resolution before this House and he commented further as follows:

It may interest you to know that this resolution was originated by members of the Democratic Party although, of course, members of both parties have signed it. At first, the sponsors had planned to have 50 Republican and 50 Democrat signers. But so many wished to co-sponsor that this idea was dropped and instead the resolution went in with 301 co-sponsors.

I think it is significant that this point was made in the negotiations in Paris. I think it indicates the wisdom of our acting favorably upon this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to mention one other area of thought with regard to this resolution because I think it tries to put back into proper context and proper thinking the question as to how American foreign policy is made. While we have a great tradition of freedom of assembly and freedom of speech in this country, that are guaranteed by the Constitution, and while there may be appropriate areas for mass demonstrations and marches to call upon the public conscience or to dramatize to move public opinion, and possibly even governmental action, on domestic issues, I would submit to you that this can be exceedingly disruptive to the formation of foreign policy.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER).

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

We are told that we should support this resolution because it is a peace resolution, calling for support of the President only "in his efforts to negotiate a just peace."

In the history of the world, more war has been waged in the name of peace than in any other name, save perhaps in the name of justice. From time immemorial, each side to military conflicts has justified its participation as in pursuit of peace and to right injustice. The United States has been active in employment of this justification, most notably in entering World War I as the quest of a war to end war.

The minority views of this resolution do a fine service in showing clearly how President Johnson used pursuit of peace as a justification for intensifying our Vietnam military involvement. The Johnson peace quotations and the resulting escalations bear repeating:

On August 5, 1964, President Johnson told the Congress that our objective was only to see that "the peace and security of the area will be preserved." By the end of that year there were 23,000 troops in Vietnam.

On April 7, 1965, President Johnson said "the only path * * * is the path of peaceful settlement." By the end of 1965 there were 181,392 troops in Vietnam.

On October 25, 1966, the President joined in a communique saying that "our united purpose is peace * * * whether through discussion and negotiation or through reciprocal actions by both sides to reduce the violence." By the end of 1966 there were 389,000 troops in Vietnam.

On March 15, 1967, President Johnson said that "I think we have all reached broad agreement on our basic objectives in Vietnam. First, an honorable peace, that will leave the people of South Vietnam free to fashion their own political and economic institutions without fear of terror or intimidation from the North." By the end of 1967 there were 485,000 troops in Vietnam.

This last formulation by President Johnson is almost identical to that in the proposed resolution before us. Its consequence was not progress toward ending the war, but to the contrary, a marked increase in our military commitment.

This is the danger many of us see in supporting the proposed resolution. We will not be euchred into supporting it merely because it calls for a just peace.

Certainly everyone in the country and every Member of Congress is for a just peace in Vietnam. Proponents of the resolution attempt to imply, insidiously I think, that anyone who opposes the resolution must therefore be opposed to a just peace. This, of course, is nonsense. For the phrase, "just peace" merely begs the basic questions posed by our participation in the war. It fails to answer, or even ask, the basic questions: Just to whom? How? At what price? When?

It seems to me that by this resolution we are endorsing whatever action President Nixon may choose to take in pursuit of his own definition of what may be a just peace—regardless of American and Vietnamese lives that may be sacrificed in this pursuit, regardless of cost, regardless of time.

I think many of the sponsors of this resolution will live to regret the day they supported it, just as many later regretted their support of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Let me remind my colleagues of the assurances that were given by our colleague, H. R. GROSS, during the debate on that hastily considered resolution, so similar to the assurances now being given by proponents of this resolution:

Mr. Speaker, this resolution neither gives nor takes from the President any authority already delegated to him to act in an emergency or crisis.

Neither is it to declare war and it is in the nature of an after-the-fact sense resolution endorsing an action already taken by the President.

President Johnson used the Gulf of Tonkin resolution as congressional authority to commit a half a million troops and $100 billion in Vietnam. If President Nixon decides that pursuit of a just peace requires escalation of the war, I assure you that he will be waving this resolution, too, in the faces of those who supported it.

The assurances of the proponents of this resolution that it endorses no future military actions ring hollow, indeed, in the face of their rejection in committee of amendments making it clear that the resolution would not afford any authorization for commitment or maintenance of troops in Vietnam or for any enlargement of our military involvement. If this is what they meant, why did they refuse to make it explicit? And why did they insist on a closed rule preventing an amendment on the floor to make these meanings clear? The only conclusion from these refusals is that they wished to leave the resolution open to interpretation as authorizing future military action by the President—as the blankcheck they so vehemently deny is being granted.

Indeed, many are interpreting this resolution as support for the President's policies as enunciated in his speech on November 3, 1969, in which he explicitly anticipated the possibility of a military escalation in response to any increase in enemy attacks. The President so interpreted it in his unprecedented appearance before the House on November 13 to applaud the resolution's sponsors.

The proponents' principal argument for the resolution appears to be a call for unity to strengthen the President's hand in negotiating a settlement of the war. This resolution will not accomplish that purpose, for it represents a false unity behind a policy on which there is such great disagreement in the country and in Congress.

First of all, more than 300 sponsors of the resolution were obtained only by drafting the language so loosely that its meaning can be and has been interpreted as backing everything from pursuit of military victory to withdrawal of our troops. The use of the phraseology "just peace" permits each Member to interpret as he will what kind of "just peace" he is supporting, and thus renders the unity illusory.

Second, I am convinced that no amount of unity, real or apparent, will persuade Hanoi to negotiate its surrender in Paris—yet, in my opinion, that is the continuing import of the Nixon administration's Vietnam policies. The President's November 3 speech continues to offer settlement only on terms satisfactory to the military regime in Saigon which is interested only in perpetuating its power. Those terms can only be won on the battlefield, and so long as we maintain them, we are committing ourselves indefinitely to the battle.

If the President wants unity, he can get it only behind a policy of ending the war, not of continuing it, even in the name of peace.

I do not support precipite unilateral withdrawal which the President and the proponents of this resolution pose falsely as the only alternative to the President's policy of "Vietnamization" and an indefinite military commitment to the Thieu-Ky regime. Nor do I support the Goodell resolution for a fixed timetable of withdrawal, for that, I think, equally precludes settlement and an orderly resolution of the war.

But there are other alternatives worth serious consideration by the administration and Congress, including settlement on realistic terms of partition or coalition reflecting the division of power now existant in South Vietnam or, failing any formal agreement, permitting the fighting to "fade away" as many of our Vietnam experts have predicted would be the most likely avenue of the war's resolution.

I do not seek to impose a coalition on South Vietnam—neither can I condone continuing to impose the Thieu-Ky tyranny on that beleaguered land.

This resolution fails to encourage the President to take available alternative avenues to end the war. Instead, it endorses whatever measures he may choose to take in the name of a "just peace." It abdicates all congressional responsibility for future Vietnam policies. Despite the enormous pressures to support the President in pursuit of so lofty a goal as a just peace, I am not ready to give the President the kind of blank check endorsement required to permit him to justify whatever action he may decide is needed to achieve his interpretation of that goal.

I urge defeat of the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OTTINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the gentleman feel that we should abandon our efforts to obtain a just peace based upon the will of the people of South Vietnam?

Mr. OTTINGER. Most certainly not. This is exactly what I deplored as the efforts of the sponsors to imply that opposition to the resolution constitutes opposition to a just peace. I favor a just peace but I do not favor approving whatever the President may do in the name of a just peace. I do not feel that we should continue the war indefinitely in order to bolster up the existing Government of South Vietnam. I think that is the course on which the President is now involved, and that it will not lead to a just peace. It will not lead to any peace at all.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota (Mr. BERRY).

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the majority of the members on that committee. I rise in support of the Speaker, who placed his country ahead of any political connotation. I also rise in support of the majority and minority leaders who were influential in bringing this resolution to the House floor.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, this is the most important action this body has taken or will take in a long time. I say this because I believe this action may hasten the day when a peace, although possibly a nervous peace, will mean the end to the killing in Vietnam and will mean the time when all American boys can be brought home.

The thing that so many people fail to realize is that, as the well-known historian Bernard B. Fall, points out in his history of Vietnam, the Communist philosophy is that politics plays an even greater part in revolutionary and guerrilla warfare than does the military itself. Fall quotes from the North Vietnamese historian Long March in his 1947 book entitled "The Resistance Will Win" in which he says:

> Politics and military action. These two questions are closely related: "War is a continuation of politics." (Marx) . . . Military action is a measure by which politics are executed . . . [there are] those who have a tendency only to rely on military action. They tend to believe that everything can be settled by armed force; they do not apply political mobilization, are unwilling to give explanations and to convince people."

What we are seeing in America today is a replay of the history of the French-Indochina war where Paris and France were made the political battlefield with riots, marches, and demonstrations and the streets of France being made the major political battlefield just as it is being done in America today.

I would call your attention to the transcript of the radio interview which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last Tuesday in which Maj. Nick Rowe, who had been a Vietcong prisoner for 5½ years before escaping, told how his captors tried to convince him that his Government was wrong and that they were right and how he was told that they would tell him the truth every day until he would finally believe them.

Major Rowe went on to tell about how in the first years of his captivity they relied on their own sources to provide propaganda, but that along in 1967 they dropped all Communist propaganda sources and began to quote from the American news media, magazines, and wire services, UPI and AP. He said:

> I think the most devastating was when they began to quote from prominent men within our own government condemning our efforts in Vietnam and calling for withdrawal.

Then he told about how he was at the Washington Monument during the moratorium march and told how his heart sank when he saw the American flag being desecrated and the Vietcong flags being hoisted above the American flag. He also told of how he felt certain that these are the pictures that would be used by the North Vietnamese and by the Vietcong for propaganda purposes to boost the morale of their people.

Then Major Rowe quoted from a Vietcong major by the name of Nuyen G. Kong, one of the political cadre from the Liberation National Front, and quoted the major as saying:

> We do not expect a military victory, nor do we expect an immediate political victory, but through the dissension and disorder in the United States the government, this is the American government, will be deprived of the support of the people and forced to withdraw from Vietnam, and at that time, we, speaking of the Liberation National Front, will have total and final victory.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to prove to that Vietcong officer and every officer in the Communist effort that the American people have not been forced through dissension and disorder to abandon their support of their fighting men and the purpose for which they have been giving their lives.

The purpose of this resolution is to prove to the negotiators in Paris, to Hanoi and to the Vietcong, that the vast majority of the American people, who we in Congress represent, support the President of the United States in his peace efforts.

That is all this resolution does—its purpose is to counteract Communist propaganda by pointing out that the "silent majority" wants peace, peace the American way, peace the President's way, and this is our way of registering that support and doing what we can to bring about peace.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS).

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I will vote against this resolution, the first resolution concerning Vietnam this body has considered in 5 years. For the Foreign Affairs Committee to report the resolution without having held hearings is irresponsible. Since President Nixon has already stated that he will consider passage of this resolution as approval of his past, present, and future policies toward Vietnam, to now consider this grave issue under a closed rule is unconscionable. The effects of this resolution, should it be passed, are only too clear. Both Mr. Nixon and Secretary Laird have stated that the possibility of reescalating the war has not been ruled out. Therefore, approval of this resolution will mean to Mr. Nixon what the Gulf of Tonkin resolution meant to Mr. Johnson—before-the-fact justification of future actions, whatever they may be. Furthermore, approval will not give a "clear indication" of popular and political support for the President's policies. The closed rule and lack of hearings eliminated that possibility. Besides, the deceptions in this resolution are too transparent. The American people will not be fooled any more than Hanoi and the National Liberation Front. Everyone will know of the manner in which this resolution was considered and the intentionally vague language in which it was written. There is, therefore, no reason to support this resolution. Of course, everyone claims to desire peace in Vietnam. That is not the question. The question remains: How do we end the war?

This resolution does not answer that question nor does it call upon the President to do so. The resolution says nothing about urging or requiring further troop withdrawals. It simply supports Mr. Nixon "in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam." The President himself has said that negotiations have not brought progress toward peace. By remaining silent on the matter of troop withdrawals, this resolution, in my judgment, by implication supports the dictatorial Saigon regime of Thieu and Ky whose obdurance in Paris has severely hampered those negotiations. The President claims he has a plan of an orderly, scheduled timetable for complete withdrawal of U.S. combat troops. Yet, this so-called "plan" is riddled with contradictions. He said on November 3 that three factors are conditions for our withdrawal:

First, progress in the negotiations; second, the level of fighting in South Vietnam; and third, the improved capability of the South Vietnamese forces. These are all factors over which the President has little or no control. Vietnamization of the war is a fraud. It is deceptive to think that this policy could have any other result than a prolongation of our involvement. The fundamental error of this resolution is the assumption that we are supporting the principle of self-determination for the Vietnamese people. But, in point of fact, the Thieu-Ky regime has repeatedly opposed any new elections without their supervision. What the President "plans" to do and what Thieu will allow are two different things. Thus, the surest way not to achieve self-determination for the Vietnamese people is for the United States to continue support of the Thieu-Ky regime. The inescapable fact is that as long as we support the Saigon government we can never achieve peace in Vietnam.

Approval of this resolution will only sanction further travel down the same road to an indefinite commitment of extended fighting in an already discredited war. The bringing of peace must not be considered the exclusive domain of Presidents and diplomats, for they have failed, and are failing, to bring an end to this horrible war. Congress must do more than serve up this vague language to a President who has taken only the most meager steps in the direction of peace. I do not support his past policies. Nor can I support his "plan" for the future which only points toward an indefinite prolongation of this war. This is the Tonkin resolution revisited, and as one Member of this House I will have no part of it.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BURLISON).

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for House Resolution 613. But it should be understood that this vote is cast only for the clear content of that resolution. Some, including the President, have apparently interpreted support of this resolution to embody endorsement of everything President Nixon has said and done about Vietnam as well as everything he may say or do about this involvement in the future. The purpose of this statement is to divorce my vote from any such interpretation.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, because many questions have been raised concerning the implications of the Wright resolution, I would like to put the pending vote on this resolution in correct perspective.

I plan to vote for the resolution because of my recognition of the primacy of the office of the Presidency in the conduct of foreign affairs. But because of the interpretation being placed upon it in some quarters as an endorsement of the President's November 3 speech when the resolution was, in fact, written before that speech was ever delivered, I find it necessary to make clear what passage of this resolution should and should not represent.

First, passage of this resolution should in no way condone the procedures under which this matter was brought before the House. The Foreign Affairs Committee provided no opportunity for a hearing on this resolution. The Rules Committee adopted a closed rule which precluded the offering of amendments to it. Both actions are wrong. A matter of such import should have been open to both hearings in committee and amendment on the House floor.

Second, passage of this resolution should not be interpreted in any quarter as either a blanket endorsement of every facet of the President's November 3 speech or as a pledge of unqualified support for any future Presidential action as yet unknown and undefined.

I support House Resolution 613 with the reservations stated above, because it would misstate my position to imply that I do not endorse the fondest hope:

First, that the President will exert all "his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam";

Second, that the South Vietnamese realize the benefits of a democratic government chosen by them "by means of free elections open to all Vietnamese";

Third, that it would be possible for "an impartial and international body" to aid in securing these benefits; and

Fourth, that the "controversy be peacefully" resolved in order that the war may be ended and peace may be restored at last in Southeast Asia.

But regardless of my vote on the resolution itself, I believe that in addition to further troop withdrawals, future U.S. policy should at least include:

First, efforts to further reduce the level of violence in Vietnam, looking to a cease-fire;

Second, efforts to substantially broaden the South Vietnamese Government; and Third, the immediate designation of a high-level replacement for retiring delegate Henry Cabot Lodge.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, my name is listed as one of the sponsors of this resolution, but I am urging the House today to vote against its adoption. This resolution was written before the President's November 3 speech. Its words were intended to reflect events and statements which took place prior to that speech. However, adoption of this resolution now will be interpreted by all the world in terms of the President's November 3 speech and put the House of Representatives on record as supporting that position. Unfortunately, President Nixon's speech narrowed this country's options to two. He described them as Vietnamization of the war—whatever that now means—and gradual withdrawal, or, using his words, "immediate, precipitate withdrawal of all Americans from Vietnam." He rejected the latter.

Mr. Chairman, at the time I was asked to be a cosponsor of this resolution, I had no intention of endorsing a future Presidential policy, of which I had no informed knowledge. Yet in this case, we apparently are being asked to act prospectively. I can assure you that no one disclosed to me that this resolution had been carefully cleared in advance by the White House. So it is for these reasons—not because of the hopes expressed in the resolution—but because of the manner in which it is being distorted in its usage that compels me to vote against it.

I personally think there were serious omissions in the President's speech—and in the specific light of that speech—there are serious omissions in this resolution. We should not lock ourselves into a box. I—for one—believe there are other alternatives. One of them would be to actually make the Government of Vietnam work for the people of Vietnam. President Thieu has proposed to the Vietnamese National Assembly the most ambitious land reform program ever proposed by any government in power in the history of the world. That program would abolish all tenant farming in Vietnam. The landlords could retain only that land which they personally work with their own two hands. Land to the tiller would go to all those who till it—South Vietnamese and Vietcong alike. Studies by our own Government show that what the peasant wants most—above all else, including his own personal security—is ownership of the land.

Adoption of such a program would cut the Communists off at the ankles. Right now, they are able to recruit guerrillas by promising land to the tiller. In my opinion, the impact of such a land reform program by South Vietnam would do as much to end the war as any other step that could be taken. It also would give many people in America some logical reason to support the Government of South Vietnam. What is the status of that bold proposal? It is now bogged down in the Vietnamese Senate—that is where it is, that is where it will probably remain.

The South Vietnamese could also do something about inflation and war profiteering. Recently, the Government of South Vietnam increased import taxes on nonessential commodities. Many merchants not only passed this tax increase to the consumer on nonessential commodities but also on the necessities of life, including food. As a result, the cost of living index has gone up another 10 percent. Once again, the little guy in Vietnam is paying through the nose. How we can expect the ordinary man to support a government which permits this to happen is beyond me.

Then there is the matter of free elections, which have never really been permitted in Vietnam. Even the candidates are sanitized. The voting tallies are low and those who are elected are not supported by a majority of the voters. There is suppression of any voice in dissent. The man who secured the next highest number of votes—because he discussed an alternative—has been in prison ever since. So there is no evidence yet that the people of South Vietnam even support the Government.

I, of course, favor the withdrawal of our forces from Vietnam as rapidly as possible consistent with their security.

The time to carefully explore our alternatives is now—while we still have some leverage to influence the course of events. The administration should commit itself, with renewed vigor, to such a course.

Mr. Chairman, this resolution should be returned to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for further study and revision. Adoption by the House in its present form would be a disservice, not only to America, but also to South Vietnam.

Mr. Chairman, I also take note of the stringent limitation on time and the fact a closed rule denies any right of amending to perfect the resolution.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I will vote against House Resolution 613 and would like to take just a few minutes to state why.

If one is guided by the words of the resolution alone, without putting them in the context of recent days and months, they seem innocuous enough. Doubtless the resolution was carefully drafted so that it would be innocuous—at least on its face. After all, who can object to supporting the Nation's President in his efforts to negotiate a peaceful settlement to a bloody conflict which has already claimed so many American lives and cast such a shadow over the American spirit.

But, of course, things are not that simple. House Resolution 613 cannot be read out of context, and it cannot be voted for out of context. The resolution has been drafted, promoted, and when it is passed it will be heralded as support for President Nixon's present policy in South Vietnam. I do support efforts to end the war in Vietnam; I do support efforts to stop the killing and to negotiate a peace which will do honor both to this country and to the Americans who have died in South Vietnam. The dispute here is not over ends, it is over the means to achieve those ends. And this is where I believe we must be honest. We cannot obscure the differences over how to end the war in Vietnam by merely agreeing that it should be ended. We cannot avoid taking public positions on what precise steps are necessary to reduce the level of violence and stop the killing by blithely affirming our desire that there be peace on earth and good will toward men. That is why hearings on this resolution would have been so important. That is why an open rule would have been so important. That is why the plea for unity rings a little hollow under such a procedure—like the local union which sent a telegram to the company president wishing him a speedy recovery from an ailment. It concluded the telegram by saying, "the vote on this issue was 18 to 10."

I would have thought that in the case of South Vietnam especially, it would be clear to most Members of this body that casting a vote on the mere words of a resolution is insufficient. If there were any proof needed, the Gulf of Tonkin resolution should certainly have provided that proof for us. The words of that resolution are also innocuous enough. No one could accuse a legislator voting for that resolution of having been a warmonger or a militarist. But it was the context of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution that was important. It was what that resolution signified to a President in whose behalf it was introduced; it was what it has come to mean since it was passed that cannot be ignored when we vote on House Resolution 613 today.

Let there be no mistake about it: voting for this resolution will be construed just as votes for the Gulf of Tonkin resolution were construed 5 years ago. Those votes will be construed as underwriting an indefinite prolongation of American presence in South Vietnam. They will be interpreted as support for a policy President Nixon has told us will keep American support troops in South Vietnam indefinitely and will keep American combat troops there—he has not told us how long. They will be construed as support of continued spending of billions of dollars in South Vietnam for the foreseeable future. We may tell ourselves that House Resolution 613 means nothing more than the words on the page, but we know that voting for that resolution really means much more.

President Nixon obviously has given up hope that the Paris negotiations will bear fruit. Of his original formula, only the behavior of the enemy on the battlefield and the progress of Vietnamization remain as determining factors in the pace of U.S. withdrawals. Will a slower pace make that withdrawal any more honorable than it would be at a faster pace? Will the world be fooled that we did not make a disastrous miscalculation of American interests when we committed our troops to combat in 1965? Will history judge us as nobler or wiser because we took 3 years to withdraw from South Vietnam after we decided it was a mistake, rather than 1 year? I do not think so. But the question which is really more important than whether we can fool the world is whether we can continue to fool ourselves.

The Gulf of Tonkin resolution passed this Chamber unanimously. George Santayana said that those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I regret that, unlike many Members, I have not prepared remarks on this resolution, but I would like to call a few items to the attention of the Members, realizing that they are very properly engrossed in this subject and recognizing that this resolution is one of the more important items that we have taken up for consideration in this session of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, before emphasizing positive arguments in support of the resolution before us, I wish to clarify the reason for my votes when we adopted the rule. Consistent with a personal pattern that I have adopted I support open rules or at least limited open rules in contrast to a closed rule. I follow the same policy when Ways and Means Committee bills have been subject to a closed rule.

There is no doubt in my mind that if we had a complete open rule all amendments would be beaten back. For example, I myself would have vigorously opposed the amendment which would have been offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) and those which would have come from the ultraliberals in the House who are more interested in criticizing the President than in supporting any constructive policy for peace.

There is no doubt that the North Vietnamese hierarchy are keen observers of the American scene and that they are misinterpreting the issue involved in the moratorium performance and the widespread coverage given the so-called peace movement. The so-called antiwar establishment does not have a monopoly on a desire for peace. Certainly no one wants a just peace as much as President Nixon. Our foreign policy goal is to help produce lasting peace with freedom for all peoples of the world.

History shows that peace can be maintained if a nation remains vigilant, strong, and consistent with its legitimate objectives. History further shows that appeasement and compromise of fundamental principles produce failure. The President, fully aware of his responsibility to all people, will continue to pursue an objective policy toward a goal of world peace and freedom. To maintain our national institutions and preserve world stability, he will not be intimidated by street demonstrators nor any other questionable types of organized pressure.

I notice my dear friend from Illinois who just addressed the House was concerned over the language of the resolution. As I read the resolution the very opening sentence states as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

I do not think this is language which would give the President any unusual authority. We want the President to negotiate a just peace. The emphasis is "negotiate a just peace."

I would also like to read from a letter which has just come to my attention from the Prime Minister of Israel, Mrs. Golda Meir, to the President of the United States commending him for his speech of November 3, and I quote from that letter, as follows:

The Prime Minister wishes to congratulate the President on his meaningful speech and expresses her hope that he will speedily succeed in bringing about peace in Vietnam.

The President's speech contains much that encourages and strengthens freedom-loving small nations the world over which, striving to maintain their independent existence, look to that great democracy, the United States of America.

I believe it would be fair for us to say that any President of the United States, regardless of party background is a man who supports peace. I do not think there is anyone who wanted peace during his term of office more than President Johnson did. I do not think there is anyone today who wants peace more than President Nixon does.

I think we in the House of Representatives and the gentlemen in the other body all realize that this is an extremely difficult problem that the President has inherited. Peace is the goal of our foreign policy. We certainly in this House of Representatives in supporting this resolution merely let it be known that we want a just peace and that a just peace is our goal.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. In connection with Mrs. Meier's letter which the gentleman from Illinois quoted from, is the gentleman aware that during an explanation in Parliament shortly thereafter, she gave the explanation that some small countries stand alone on their own, but they cannot stand up to all outside enemies.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I am sure that the gentleman supports the request which Mrs. Meier has made for certain military equipment and which will be purchased here in the United States, and the efforts she is making to keep her country independent. The aggression by the North Vietnamese Communists against South Vietnam is direct but the aggression against Israel by the Arab States would not be taking place without the involvement of the Soviet Union. It is obvious that the Soviet Union's presence in the Middle East is much of the cause for tension there as is their direction and aid to the North Vietnamese in their invasion of South Vietnam.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I do not see the Vietnamese situation in that context, but I shall not take up the gentleman's time to dispute that. However, Secretary of Defense Laird has indicated that although he desires to achieve peace, there is the further indication that we might increase our military efforts if this is not accomplished.

Does the gentleman from Illinois concede that that is a part of the efforts to achieve a just peace?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I think if the gentleman would be objective he would recognize that one of the things that might bring about a just peace is the recognition by the aggressor in Vietnam that they do not have total and permanent sanctuary. In my opinion it would be effective for them to understand that they cannot continue their deliberate noncooperative attitude with reference to our efforts to achieve peace in Paris and with reference to many other efforts that have been made.

Mr. MIZE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MIZE. I do not think we can overemphasize the fact that the resolution very clearly uses the words "to negotiate a just peace." It does not say "achieve a just peace." It says "negotiate a just peace."

Mr. OTTINGER. It says, "efforts to negotiate a just peace."

Mr. MIZE. All right, "efforts to negotiate a just peace."

Mr. OTTINGER. The gentleman just said that there might be an increase in the war effort itself if this is not done. Could the gentleman interpret that?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Just a minute. I want to be sure that the distinguished gentleman from New York is not innocently misinterpreting what I said. I, in effect, said that our negotiators in Paris and our diplomats ought to have the option to communicate to the aggressor the fact that they are not free to continue as they have in the past believing they have total and permanent sanctuary and that for effective negotiations we must maintain logical and legitimate options so that an adjustment in our policies would produce truly effective negotiations.

Mr. OTTINGER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, it is amazing to me—simply amazing—that there should be any opposition to the pending resolution which supports the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. Let us reexamine the contents of the resolution:

RESOLUTION TOWARD PEACE WITH JUSTICE IN VIETNAM

Resolved, That the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for such a peace, calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith toward the Government of North Vietnam, approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body, and that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections, and supports the President in his call upon the Government of North Vietnam to announce its willingness to honor such elections and to abide by such results and to allow the issues in controversy to be peacefully so resolved in order that the war may be ended and peace may be restored at last in Southeast Asia.

It is understandable that some Americans may have reservations about the wisdom of ever allowing ourselves to become involved in a land war in Asia. But that issue is not involved here. It is equally understandable that some Americans feel very strongly, as I do, that the no-win policy in fighting that war has been a tragic mistake. But, again, that issue is not involved here. It is likewise understandable that many of us opposed the cessation of bombing of the north, in response to pressures from home and abroad. But that is not involved in this resolution.

What is involved here is the matter of an expression of support for the President in his tireless quest for a just peace in Vietnam. If I were opposed to a just peace in Vietnam I would certainly be opposed to this resolution. But being in favor of a peaceful settlement I, of course, strongly support this expression. In fact, I am a cosponsor of the resolution.

What objective can opposition to this lofty purpose serve? It can, and I assume will, be interpreted by Hanoi as a sign of division on the part of the American people. In that respect such opposition can be expected to encourage the Communists to prolong the war and kill more Americans. It is just that simple. Wittingly or unwittingly, opposition expressed here today to a just peace in Vietnam can, to the extent it is expressed, encourage the enemy.

Fortunately, however, resistance to the achievement of a just peace in Vietnam is confined to a relatively small group.

It is unthinkable that any of the Members of this body are really and sincerely opposed to a just peace. Certainly Hanoi is opposed to a just peace. The Communists have consistently opposed everything contained in this resolution. So, let us think this thing through and be realistic about what is really involved here.

It will be recalled that only last week, the Assistant Commandant of the Marine Corps was quoted in Da Nang as saying that in his judgment the Vietnam war would have been over a year ago if the administration had had the full backing of the American people.

That was Gen. Lewis W. Walt speaking. He went on to say this:

The day the enemy firmly believes we are not going to pull out, that is the day he will start talking in Paris, and not before.

This four-star general spent 2 years in Vietnam as the top marine commander in the war zone. Surely he is more knowledgeable on this subject than any Member of this body. We had better heed his judgment.

General Walt is not alone in this respect. His views are shared by practically all responsible military and civilian leaders in this country, and in my judgment by the overwhelming majority of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, there is much evidence the war in Vietnam has, in effect, been won. Many of our military authorities have said so. But the enemy continues to mount suicidal attacks, undoubtedly inspired by the eruption of antiwar clamor on the part of a noisy but small minority of our people. Now, of all times, there is need for unity in this country. In that way we can exploit our advantages and save American lives. In pursuance of that objective this resolution should have the unanimous support of this body.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. HUNGATE).

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Chairman—

The Congress shall have power . . . to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water (art. I, sec. 8).

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. (art. II, sec. 2).

On October 6, in accordance and harmony with both of the above constitutional requirements, I joined with a bipartisan group of over 100 members in introducing the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the substantial reductions in United States ground combat forces in Vietnam already directed are in the national interest and that the President be supported in his expressed determination to withdraw our remaining such forces at the earliest practicable date.

In doing so, I made clear that I support the President in his efforts and proposals to beat the Clark Clifford timetable for withdrawal of ground combat forces from Vietnam.

The Clifford timetable called for removal of 100,000 ground combat troops by January 1, 1970. Current reports are that as of December 15, 60,000 such troops will have been removed. I support the President in his proposal, vigorously pronounced in June 1969, to beat the Clifford timetable. This requires the removal of 40,000 additional troops this month, Mr. President, and I reiterate my support of your promised intentions to do so.

As Commander in Chief, no resolutions from me are required for the President to meet this commitment. In fact, it might be considered presumptuous of me, or anyone else, to offer such resolutions instructing the President in his duties.

Furthermore, congressional resolutions tend to be irresolutely construed.

The Gulf of Tonkin resolution became a congressional credit card on which over 39,000 lives, over 200,000 casualties and over $100 billion were expended, with no constitutional sanction. A vote for a simple appropriations measure—which by our own rules cannot contain legislation—is interpreted as approval for the uses that may be made of bombers, strafers, defoliants, and napalm. Unfortunately, in congressional language "viva voce" has been read to mean "carte blanche."—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 112, part 4, page 4429.

Vietnam contains valuable, although frightfully expensive, lessons for the American people and the world. The most powerful air and missile striking force, complete with a trillion dollar arsenal, cannot defeat peasants with punji sticks, if they are willing to resist to the death. The illusion of national security being obtained through airpower should be thoroughly shattered. Corroboration can be found in the celebrated triumph of Israel airpower over Egypt in the 6-day war, that weeks, months, years later continues, without resolution. Perhaps it is better to be martially unprepared as we were in World Wars I and II, if we can preserve a nation morally united in the causes to which our Constitution commits us.

It seems to shock many that war is a dehumanizing process. It shocks others that while we may commend and promote those who bomb, strafe and burn enemy villages, containing, almost by necessity, the innocent, along with the guilty—the simple child beside the Vietcong cadre—yet their comrades on the ground, who accomplish the same result in a somewhat more personal manner, through the use of rifles, carbines, and knives, must be tried for murder. It requires a high degree of sophistication to appreciate this distinction.

Are draftees to be sent halfway round the world on missions to "search and destroy" then to be tried each time for murder, when, under the strains of combat, they go berserk, killing innocent civilians? Are they to be held fully and legally accountable for their actions under those conditions? What shall we do to those who voluntarily seek the responsibility for running this Government? What is our responsibility to that draftee, his parents, and survivors?

I do not believe that responsibility can be met by passing the buck. Perhaps it cannot even be met by passing resolutions.

In World War II, the infantry school at Fort Benning, Ga., operated a course for reconnaissance patrols in combat areas. In the problem, the purpose of the patrol's mission was to obtain information only. Discovery of the patrol's existence could imperil the entire body of troops, the battalion or regiment to which the patrol belonged. To instill the lesson that the unit's whereabouts must not be learned from the patrol's activities, in one part of the problem you were to enter an enemy field hospital, complete with nurses, doctors, and patients, and kill everyone in it, with one part involving bayoneting patients in their beds.

Vietnam is not the first war in which acts of brutal inhumanity were perpetrated nor, of course, are we the only side who perpetrated them.

If the Vietnam conflict continues, My Lai will most certainly not be the last atrocity to occur. The question is: Are the goals we seek in Vietnam worth the My Lai's, past, present, and future?

The responsibility for that decision must rest with someone who gets about $200,000 a year and his 500 or more congressional associates drawing around $42,500. It is not quite fair to place that responsibility on some poor devil who is drafted and sent to Vietnam at $188 a month.

A vote for this resolution will be an expression of agreement that My Lai and over 200,000 casualties are an acceptable price to attempt to obtain the goals we seek in Vietnam. There are some who find that price too high.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am voting in favor of House Resolution 613 as an expression of support for President Nixon's action in reducing U.S. ground combat forces in Vietnam, his expressed determination to withdraw our remaining such forces at the earliest practicable date, and his efforts toward a just peace in that tragic conflict.

My vote should not be misinterpreted as support for renewed escalation, a prolonged delay in the return of our men, or the Thieu-Ky regime. I favor an inexorable and speedy return of our men from Vietnam and believe this can be done most quickly without Congress imposing deadlines that may only delay any activity until the deadline arrives.

With the passage of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution on August 7, 1964, the Congress gave, in effect, a blank check to President Johnson to conduct an undeclared war. This was a dangerous precedent, regardless of who was President. I support President Nixon, but as an elected Member of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, I will not surrender my duties with a blank check to any administration.

From the beginning of our Vietnam involvement, I have expressed serious doubts. I believe our involvement was ill-conceived and that we should bring our men home as fast as is consistent with allowing the "little people" of South Vietnam a fighting chance of survival. I exclude the Thieu-Ky government from my definition, because I feel a critical mistake on our past has been to tie our commitments to a specific regime in Saigon.

In allowing the South Vietnamese people a chance for survival, we either must give them the means to protect their lives or Hanoi must explicitly agree not to conduct a blood bath as we leave.

We Americans may debate the speed of our withdrawal, but the fact is that the President has radically changed our policy in Vietnam. After 6 years of only sending more men over, we are now bringing American men home. After 6 years of Americanizing the war, we are now turning it back to the South Vietnamese. Many of the President's critics now are the ones who failed then.

Therefore, I have sponsored this resolution to back the President as he continues to withdraw our troops from Vietnam and strives for a political settlement of this most unfortunate war. I again emphasize, however, that this support does not include renewed escalation or prolonged delay.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. FARBSTEIN).

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. ADAIR) for being kind enough to yield me this time, inasmuch as I understand that the remaining time is running very close to the requests he has, so I fully appreciate the thoughtfulness of the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose House Resolution 613.

I do not oppose it because I do not support the President in his efforts to achieve peace in Vietnam. I do not oppose it because I do not support the President in his program to reduce the U.S. military commitment in South Vietnam. In these efforts he has my prayers and my support.

I oppose this resolution on other grounds. It calls upon the Congress to approve a policy that is not only vague but one over which the United States has little control. The President, in his speech of November 3, 1969, stated that the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam would depend upon: First, progress at the Paris peace talks; second, the level of enemy activity; and, third, progress of training programs of the South Vietnamese forces.

Only over the last of these stipulations does the United States have any control and even that influence depends upon the cooperation of the South Vietnamese.

For too long U.S. policy in Vietnam has been dependent upon the attitudes of Saigon and Hanoi. We must change this policy. We must seize the initiative. We must adopt a policy that is in our own national interest. To do this we must begin by convincing the Government of South Vietnam that we intend to be the masters of our policy. We can do this by announcing our intention to withdraw all our forces at the earliest possible moment.

The best way to insure that the Government of South Vietnam will undertake an accelerated program to gain the support of its people and build a military structure capable of maintaining their territorial and political integrity is to convince that Government that the United States does not intend to remain in Vietnam very long. The Government of South Vietnam must be convinced that the United States intends to withdraw all of her forces as quickly as possible. This will give that Government the impetus and the will to assume the burden of securing their own freedom.

This is one of the glaring weaknesses of the resolution. It does not convey any sense of immediacy or urgency concerning either termination of that war or the withdrawal of American troops. And as long as the South Vietnamese are convinced that the United States will continue to support them, as long as they can rely upon U.S. military forces, there is little likelihood that the Government of South Vietnam will take the action required to reform their political and military structure. By this I mean that the Government of South Vietnam must broaden its base to include all elements of South Vietnamese society. Only in this way will that Government be able to gain the support and confidence necessary to win the peace and to survive as a viable political and economic entity.

There is another weakness in this resolution. The resolution approves and supports the principle that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own Government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial body and that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections. It also calls upon the Government of North Vietnam to announce its willingness to honor such elections and to abide by such results. No such request is made to the Government of South Vietnam where there has already been one "free" election in 1967. It was so free that a number of prominent South Vietnamese were not permitted to run for public office and the man who placed second to Thieu for President was arrested. He is still a prisoner. It seems to me that if this resolution is to be meaningful it should also call upon the Government of South Vietnam to permit free elections without restricting the candidates to those who can be counted on to support the government in power. In a democracy there is strength in diversity.

We are also being asked to support a policy that could result in an increase in U.S. military activity rather than a reduction. Thus the President said in his Vietnam speech of November 3:

> If I conclude that increased enemy action jeopardizes our remaining forces, I shall not hesitate to take strong and effective measures to deal with that situation.

Again, our policy will depend upon what South Vietnam does or does not do. If U.S. support, artillery and Air Force troops remain in Vietnam after U.S. ground combat forces have been withdrawn, their safety and well-being will depend upon the actions of the Army of the Republic of Vietnam. Their safety may very well be jeopardized. If this were to occur would we respond by again sending U.S. combat infantry divisions back to Vietnam? This aspect of the resolution concerns me very much.

I am aware of the dilemma that the President is facing. The problem of how to Vietnamize the war and thereby reduce American casualties is dependent upon forces over which the United States has little control. In my opinion, this problem can only be solved by the South Vietnamese themselves. If they delay or hamper the development of their armed forces, Vietnamization will take a very long time indeed. The Government and people of South Vietnam must win the peace. We cannot do it for them.

We have been in Vietnam long enough and I think it is about time to get out. We have done what we set out to do—prevent the conquest of South Vietnam by the forces of the North.

We have been assured that the Government of South Vietnam is capable of not only governing but also of assuming responsibility for the defense of South Vietnam. So now is the time to withdraw, not in defeat but in the knowledge that the mission has been accomplished.

In committee there were efforts made to amend this resolution to make it more meaningful. Efforts to include language which would have expressed congressional desire that the intent of the resolution was not to escalate the war but to support the President in his efforts to secure a just peace were defeated.

Mr. Chairman, I could support this resolution if it contained language suggesting a sense of urgency concerning our withdrawal; if there were an admonition against escalation, and if it called upon the Government of South Vietnam to hold free elections and to abide by the results. Since we have a closed rule it will not be possible to amend the resolution. I, therefore, regretfully must vote against the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARBSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the gentleman find anything wrong with the principle of free elections open to all of the South Vietnamese including the Vietcong and supervised by an impartial international body?

Mr. FARBSTEIN. None whatsoever.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is not that the thrust of the resolution? Does the gentleman read the resolution properly? The resolution puts that as its central thrust.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. It does not call upon the South Vietnamese to accept that principle and that is the important thing that concerns me.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. FRIEDEL) for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Chairman, prior to the President's Vietnam speech on November 3, I joined some 50 of my colleagues in cosponsoring House Resolution 613. I make a point of the fact that my support for this resolution came prior to my knowledge of what the President was going to propose, because I feel strongly that the resolution should be considered on its face value as a nonpartisan expression of the sentiment of the majority of this House and that it should not be interpreted as either directly supporting or opposing the specific content of the President's November 3 speech.

I want to make certain that there is no question in the minds of my colleagues, as there is none in mine, that we are not rubberstamping any future Presidential actions as we unfortunately did in the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I specifically call attention to page 7 of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which accompanies the resolution, which states:

> The resolution does not give the President any authority whatsoever, either by reference or implication. It is simply a formal expression by the House of Representatives in support of the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Viet Nam.

My colleagues in this House and the people of the United States want an end to the war in Vietnam, but we do not want peace at any price and I believe one good effect of this resolution is that it says to North Vietnam and to the Vietcong that we are still firmly committed to a just peace settlement, one which will guarantee the right of all of the people of South Vietnam to participate in free elections.

I am convinced that such a free election would result in a broader based, more democratic Government in South Vietnam and I am also firmly convinced that such an election, supervised by some appropriate international body, as proposed in House Resolution 613, would not, as some seem to fear, result in a Communist takeover, followed by a bloodbath of reprisals after the withdrawal of all American Armed Forces.

I support this resolution because I am convinced its passage strengthens our country's bargaining position and because I believe it expresses the hopes and expectations of most Americans, just as it expresses the hopes and expectations of the vast majority of the Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield for a unanimous-consent request to the gentleman from California (Mr. ROYBAL).

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution before us. I oppose it because neither its meaning nor its intent has been unequivocally stated before this House. Different interpretations have been given the resolution by its proponents and the President has already construed the passage of this resolution as support for his policy on Vietnam. President Nixon told the House and the Nation that the resolution supports a "just peace in Vietnam along the line of the proposals I made in a speech on November 3." He went on to say that "the sponsors of the resolution were well over a majority in the House supporting the policy of the President of the United States."

But the question is—What policy? The policy couched in the vague and general language found in the resolution, or the language in part of his speech of November 3 when he said that if "I conclude that the increased enemy action jeopardizes our remaining forces in Vietnam, I shall not hesitate to take strong and effective measures to deal with the situation." "This," he said, "is a statement of policy which as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces I am making in meeting my responsibilities."

I am fearful, Mr. Chairman, that because of the resolution's ambiguity, the different interpretations given the resolution by its proponents as well as the meaning already given the resolution by the President, that it could well become a blank check authorization for Presidential action as that which was embodied in the interpretation of the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I am afraid, also, that the Vietnamization could mean the retention of 200,000 to 300,000 troops in Vietnam and the indefinite continuation of this war with its huge military spending, more U.S. casualties, and the continued killing of the people of Vietnam. I oppose this resolution, also, because of the fast manner with which it was passed in the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, without hearing from the Secretary of Defense or any member of the administration who might have shed some light as to the true intent of the resolution.

My motion to hold hearings was rejected in committee and the closed rule by which this resolution was brought to the House has made it impossible to amend it or add the necessary language to clarify its intent.

I believe that this resolution is most unfortunate primarily because of its vagueness which makes misinterpretation likely. It is unfortunate also because conducting our policy in Vietnam had not been given an opportunity to state their official position. I believe that it is unfortunate because this high-sounding moralistic resolution merely supports a President who has only altered the tactics of the previous administration, while embracing its premise and its objectives, as seasoned argument is almost silenced, and as amendments are forbidden to a small minority in this House who seek to move back to a course of reason.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute for the purpose of making an observation.

I have not spoken on the resolution yet, but I intend to later.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is interesting to point out that all of the people who are speaking against this resolution are calling upon Saigon to do this and Saigon to do that. But I have not heard one of them call upon Hanoi to do anything.

The other observation I want to make is I have 23 people listed to speak today. There was a charge made yesterday by the gentleman from Washington—the inference of which was that the proponents would have most of the time and therefore the opponents would only get theirs by largesse. I have attempted to be fair, and of the 23 who are listed, and I just say this for the record—13 are opponents and 10 are proponents, and the time is divided about equally between the two. If anything, the opponents have a little more of it.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. ADAMS).

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the chairman for yielding this time to me. I had indicated to the chairman of the committee I wished to ask some questions to clarify the resolution. I would like to propound this question to the sponsors or to anyone on the committee who wishes to answer. On the ticker the following statement appears:

> Laird told the committee President Nixon's Vietnam policy is working—and could lead to "a military victory" for the Saigon Government.
> But should the process of Vietnamization of the war falter, and North Vietnam step up military aggression, Laird said, the United States is prepared to escalate its war effort.
> "I would not rule out that possibility completely," Laird said. He did, however seem to rule out use of nuclear weapons by American forces.
> "I would not anticipate the use of nuclear weapons in Vietnam," the Defense Chief replied to a question from Representative George Mahon, Democrat-Texas. "I am not, however, ruling out other actions that might be necessary in the event the Vietnamization program does not work, even though I am confident it will work."

In voting for this resolution do we support that policy?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I would say to the gentleman, as I have said repeatedly before—and I am not sure that any answer is going to satisfy some of the opponents—the resolution merely supports the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace. It does not support him in any escalation. There is nothing implied, direct or otherwise. If the President later makes the decision that he must escalate the war, and any Member wishes to introduce a resolution of support for the President, it will be debated on its merits as this one is being debated. But this is a peace resolution, pure, simple, and unadulterated.

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the gentleman for that statement. I have a second question, which is the other question propounded to the chairman of the committee. Our chief negotiators in Paris have resigned. Apparently there is no present effort or indication that anyone is going to replace them. I want to know whether, if we go forward with this resolution, we are supporting a policy of leaving that negotiating spot open and not engaging in proceedings there further.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. The resolution was, of course, drafted prior to the resignation of our chief negotiator, Mr. Lodge. It does not address itself to that situation. I do not believe the gentleman expected it to address itself to that situation. I believe all of us anticipate that an appointment will be made, and that rather shortly. Mr. Lodge still is serving in that capacity. I believe the President has clearly stated that he is not in any sense downgrading the effort to negotiate, and that in proper time he will replace Mr. Lodge with another high-level negotiator.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. I have read in the press that it may be in the President's mind not to replace Mr. Lodge for some time because there is dissatisfaction with the course of negotiations. I wonder where the gentleman from Texas is getting his information?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the chairman, who is handling the bill.

Mr. HAYS. I would say to the gentleman I have no knowledge of what the President has in his mind, and I do not generally rely on the press to read his mind. In my opinion if there was one signal that Hanoi was genuinely ready to negotiate, I would call the President and ask him to send the gentleman from Washington (Mr. ADAMS) over there if he would also send me along with him to serve with the gentleman so we would have some balance.

Mr. ADAMS. I would accept the gentleman's offer. If he offers us the opportunity, I am ready to leave this afternoon.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ERLENBORN).

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Chairman, once again, it appears that a totalitarian government has misinterpreted how we do things here in the United States.

We are a free country—so free that it is difficult for us to understand that ideas and opinions are restrained in many countries of the world. And, because the totalitarian countries are so accustomed to hearing uniformity of opinion, they tend to expect an imminent breakdown in the United States when they hear of our dissent.

German submarines undertook unrestricted war against American merchant ships in 1917, believing that we would not go to war—not after the angry 1916 presidential election campaign.

The heated debate between the isolationists and the interventionists contributed to decisions by Germany and Japan to attack us at the end of 1941. They thought we were ready to fall apart.

Now we are in a war in Vietnam, and we want out. We want peace, and we are willing to negotiate for it.

Our negotiators have been meeting with those of North Vietnam and of the National Liberation Front for more than a year. Xuan Thuy, the leader of the North Vietnam delegation, must answer to his superiors in Hanoi, and that is all. The people of North Vietnam are not looking over his shoulder nor are a gaggle of Hanoi news reporters. There is not a single North Vietnam editorial writer to second guess him.

How different is the problem of Averell Harriman and, more recently, of Henry Cabot Lodge. They must, of course, report to our administration—to the President and his advisers. And they have plentiful help from a myriad of enthusiastic Members of Congress, reporters, columnists, pacifists, commentators, professors, editorialists, and ad hoc committees.

While the North Vietnamese play a diplomatic poker game with all their cards close to the vest, we are in it with all our cards face up.

The North Vietnamese know that we have divisions within our country; know that our President is urged to yield a little more; know that some Americans believe we ought to throw the Saigon government to the wolves; know that a quarter of a million young people marched in Washington in mid-November; know that there was a moratorium in mid-October.

They know that these demonstrations demanded that we pull out of Vietnam without delay, but they do not know that no more than 15 or 20 Members of Congress concur in that demand. They may not have read Congressional Quarterly, which listed one Senator and 14 Representatives as favoring instant withdrawal.

Mr. Chairman, I think the American people want out of Vietnam. I want us to get out of Vietnam. But I do not want peace at any price, and I do not believe the American people do.

I want peace with honor, peace with justice; and I believe that is the feeling of an overwhelming majority of Americans.

There is one man who is going to lead us out of war and into peace. He is the President of the United States. At a time such as this, we must give him our hearts and our hands. We must join him in praying for peace and in working for peace.

Therefore, I support this resolution.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE).

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I expressed my strong opposition to the closed rule under which we are theoretically debating House Resolution 613. I would repeat again today that I believe this to be blatantly unfair, improper, and in the worst possible traditions of governmental and legislative process.

This is not the first time debate has been choked off in this body. On the contrary, the sad fact is that we have repeatedly been prevented from working our will.

This is becoming, I regret to say, a Congress of fear—a Congress that is afraid to face up to the monumental issues before it.

Example No. 1: When we were debating the highly controversial and very expensive ABM, the leadership refused to let us vote on the real issue. We were forced to vote on both research and development and deployment, even though most questions were being raised about deployment, and deployment alone.

Fortunately, I was able to get a rollcall that reflected House sentiment on the real issue—deployment. Lo and behold, 140 of my colleagues joined me in speaking out, whereas had we followed the leadership, we would have been silenced.

Example No. 2: When we were debating the agriculture appropriation bill, we voted 224 to 142 to limit farm subsidy payments to $20,000. The other body took this out of the bill. I worked unsuccessfully to put it back in conference.

Then I tried to offer a motion to recommit the conference bill—but I was prevented from doing so. In other words, this body was kept from voting on the real issue—farm subsidy payments.

And finally, example No. 3: We are now debating a Vietnam resolution, and we are using a closed rule to prevent amendments to legislation affecting the most critical issue facing the Nation today.

I am not proud of what is being done, and I hope many of my colleagues feel the same way.

The fact of the matter is that we, the elected representatives of the American people, are being prevented from working our will on this crucial question via the amendment process.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM).

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, first I should like to say it seems to me the sponsors of this resolution have expressed a great many different views as to what it means, and that is part of the difficulty.

The gentleman managing the bill has taken what one might call a minimum view as to what this resolution means, but other sponsors have interpreted it quite differently. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) yesterday said "yes" in answer to a question as to whether it did embrace the policy of Vietnamization. "Yes, by inference it does," he said.

Other sponsors, such as the gentleman from Illinois who just spoke, have interpreted it as supporting a policy of possible escalation. Yesterday one of the sponsors indicated that he would interpret the resolution as supporting a very stiff policy, what is often called a hawk-like policy.

It is clear that this resolution, if adopted, will be interpreted in many different ways. It has already been interpreted by the President as representing substantially an endorsement of his position as stated on November 3.

I should like now to turn to a statement made yesterday, which I regret very much. My friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. EDMONDSON) saw fit to attribute certain remarks about this resolution to "the former Ambassador who served in Paris under the previous administration." He was obviously referring to Averell Harriman. His statement was taken out of context and did not correctly represent Governor Harriman's views.

The impression he created was that Governor Harriman approves of House Resolution 613 and would vote for it if he were a Member of the House. As my friend knows, Governor Harriman's position on the matter is quite to the contrary.

Last week, the Governor was asked to meet with a group of Members privately and to give his views on this resolution.

The whole thrust of his comments during the meeting, which lasted for an hour and a half, was that he thought the resolution was ill-advised. He said it would not have any effect on the negotiations one way or the other. In reply to a direct question, he indicated that if he were a Member of Congress he would vote against it.

Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that amendments were not permitted to be submitted in this matter. If permitted, I would have proposed an amendment, for example, urging the President to press for broadening the base of the government in Saigon so as to make it more representative and to include persons capable and willing of making a negotiated settlement. I truly believe that the gentlemen now in charge in Saigon do not want a compromise settlement. Any compromise would weaken or lessen their power; therefore, they are opposed to it, no matter what they say. There are others there, non-Communists, who have a much broader following, who could be brought into the Government, such as Gen. Big Minh, who I believe could achieve a reasonable political settlement that would achieve our objective of assuring to the South Vietnamese the right to determine their own future.

Both sides have come much closer to agreement than they were two years ago. A free election under international supervision might be possible, but not so long as the present Saigon government remains in control.

Other amendments would also have improved the resolution, including an amendment that would have been offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY), approving troop withdrawals to date and supporting the President's announced intention to withdraw all American ground forces as quickly as possible, and another amendment to make clear that the resolution does not imply approval of the President's policies as outlined in his November 3 speech or constitute a blank check authorizing future actions.

Why will I vote against House Resolution 613, entitled "Resolution Toward Peace With Justice in Vietnam"?

Of course all of us in this House are for "peace with justice in Vietnam," but we have many different views as to how that objective can be achieved. If I thought passage of House Resolution 613 would contribute to the achievement of that objective, I would vote for it and explain that my vote should not be construed as approval of President Nixon's Vietnam policies. Many of my colleagues whose views on Vietnam are not very different from my own will follow that course. However, it is my considered conclusion that passage of House Resolution 613 will not only not advance the objective of "peace with justice in Vietnam," but may well be harmful in the long run. That is so, in my view, because the President may be encouraged by this resolution to follow the sterile and mistaken policies he has been following, which in effect allow Generals Thieu and Ky to exercise a veto over any possibility of settlement.

It is said that overwhelming passage of this resolution will constitute a show of unity behind the President. Again, I believe the result of passage of the resolution, especially by the procedure followed here, will further serve to polarize opinion in this country, and further persuade millions of our young people who loathe this war that our institutions are rigid and undemocratic. As I said yesterday in the debate on the procedure to be followed, it is outrageous—indeed tragic—that this first resolution on our Vietnam policy to come before the House in 5 years should be brought in on a "take it or leave it" basis, with no possibility of amendment.

I cannot vote for this resolution because it will be interpreted by the President and others to represent an endorsement of his Vietnam policies as laid out in his speech of November 3. I am far from satisfied with those policies as I understand them, and I was greatly disturbed by the November 3 speech, as I have previously indicated.

The President's November 3 speech indicated to me that he has no real hope that the war can be brought to an end by peaceful settlement, and that he hopes instead to turn the war over to the South Vietnamese. This policy will not succeed, in my judgment, and the war will drag on and on, with American involvement only slightly reduced.

I believe a peaceful settlement is possible, but only if we insist on a change in the makeup and policies of the Saigon regime. The best way to make clear to Saigon that we mean business about not allowing American boys to go on dying to keep Generals Thieu and Ky in power is to start now on a program of total withdrawal of American forces.

We have made a series of hideous mistakes in Vietnam, going all the way back to 1945. Adoption of House Resolution 613 will only extend the string of mistakes.

I understand that a motion to recommit will be made to add a sentence to the resolution urging the President to press Hanoi to abide by the Geneva Convention on the treatment of prisoners. All of us are appalled by Hanoi's cruelty in this regard, and we will vote for the motion to recommit to add this sentence. But this addition will not change the character of the main part of the resolution or correct its major defects.

The resolution could easily have been made acceptable to practically all of us if two or three reasonable amendments had been adopted. That would have been the way to achieve the greatest degree of unity.

(Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania (at the request of Mr. ADAIR) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, House Resolution 613 is clearly in need of revision on various points. I believe many of the criticisms made on the House floor are justified, and the resolution should have been opened up for amendment and serious extended debate by the House. I voted against the previous question on adopting the rule on House Resolution 613 for this purpose.

House Resolution 613 is clearly defective in omitting and failing even to mention our prisoners of war now held under tragic conditions.

Congress must not forget the continuing heavy sacrifice of these people, military and civilian who now suffer even as we debate. It is intolerable to think of a U.S. pullout of forces from Vietnam either at once or over a period of deescalation, without making sure our prisoners of war are considered as strongly as all other major factors.

I, therefore, recommend that House Resolution 613 be amended to emphasize that the Congress backs the President and our U.S. Paris negotiators, our U.S. Department of State, our Department of Defense, and other Federal agencies, in continuing to press for fair treatment for prisoners of war as adopted by the Red Cross.

I feel so strongly about the present resolution, House Resolution 613, omitting completely the fate of the prisoners of war, that I oppose House Resolution 613 in its present form. This failure is a tragic and major defect.

I hereby give notice of offering again my amendment for our prisoners of war in the form of the motion to recommit House Resolution 613 to the Foreign Affairs Committee at the end of the debate on House Resolution 613.

My motion to recommit House Resolution 613 will direct the House Foreign Affairs Committee to report the resolution back to the House immediately with an amendment as follows:

Requests the President to continue to press the Government of North Vietnam to abide by the Geneva Convention of 1949 on treatment of prisoners of war.

If my motion to recommit House Resolution 613 for the prisoner-of-war amendment is not adopted, I shall be forced to vote against House Resolution 613 in its present form. This will point out that in this debate and parliamentary procedure, that somebody is thinking of the dire straits of prisoners of war when they are not in a position to speak for themselves.

I consider prisoners of war among the highest urgency factors on past and future negotiations for peace in Vietnam. I voted against reporting House Resolution 613 out of the House Foreign Affairs Committee because of the glaring omission and lack of consideration of prisoners of war. I will move just as strongly by my proposed motion, to recommit House Resolution 613 to the House Foreign Affairs Committee to have my prisoner-of-war amendment added to the provisions of the resolution, forthwith.

In order that the House and the American people, as well as the families of these prisoners, and the prisoners of war themselves, can know of the history of this issue, as well as international Red Cross resolution, and actions of our U.S. Government I am setting out various documents as follows:

STATEMENT BY UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE ELLIOT L. RICHARDSON

We are deeply concerned about the lack of information about our prisoners. Some of them have been held four years and longer with little or no words to their families.

It is hard to see what Hanoi hopes to gain by denying the prisoners the basic right to communicate with their families. We are using every possible occasion to raise this subject and to bring about the release of prisoners on both sides.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE 21ST INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF THE RED CROSS, ISTANBUL, TURKEY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1969

PROTECTION OF PRISONERS OF WAR

The XXIst International Conference of the Red Cross,

Recalling the Geneva Convention of 1949 on the protection of prisoners of war, and the historic role of the Red Cross as a protector of victims of war,

Considering that the Convention applies to each armed conflict between two or more parties to the Convention without regard to how the conflict may be characterized,

Recognizing that, even apart from the Convention, the International community has consistently demanded humane treatment for prisoners of war, including identification and accounting for all prisoners, provision of an adequate diet and medical care, that prisoners be permitted to communicate with each other and with the exterior, that seriously sick or wounded prisoners be promptly repatriated, and that at all times prisoners be protected from physical and mental torture, abuse and reprisals,

Requests each party to the Convention to take all appropriate measures to ensure humane treatment and prevent violations of the Convention,

Calls upon all parties to abide by the obligations set forth in the Convention and upon all authorities involved in an armed conflict to ensure that all uniformed members of the regular armed forces of another party to the conflict and all other persons entitled to prisoner of war status are treated humanely and given the fullest measure of protection prescribed by the Convention: and further calls upon all parties to provide free access to the prisoners of war and to all places of their detention by a protecting Power or by the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Adopted by vote of 114 to 0.

(The International Conference of the Red Cross is held every four years and is the highest governing body of the Red Cross. Its membership consists of governments which have signed the Geneva Conventions of 1949, national Red Cross Societies, the International Committee of the Red Cross and The League of Red Cross Societies.)

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF DEFENSE MELVIN R. LAIRD

On numerous occasions I have expressed my deep concern for the welfare of our American servicemen who are prisoners of war or missing in action. In this regard, I have directed Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) G. Warren Nutter, who has been named Chairman of the Department of Defense Prisoner of War Policy Committee, to insure that the families of these servicemen are receiving all assistance to which they are entitled.

The North Vietnamese have claimed that they are treating our men humanely. I am distressed by the fact that there is clear evidence that this is not the case.

The United States Government has urged that the enemy respect the requirements of the Geneva Convention. This they have refused to do.

The North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong have never identified the names of all the U.S. prisoners whom they hold. For the most part, information on some of these Americans has come in the form of scattered, and often distorted, propaganda films and photographs which the North Vietnamese have chosen to sell or release.

We know that at least several U.S. prisoners were injured at the time of their capture and we are concerned about the medical care they are receiving.

The Geneva Convention requires a free exchange of mail between the prisoners and their families and yet very little mail has been received from only a few prisoners in the past five years.

As of next month, more than 200 American servicemen will have been listed either as prisoners of war or as missing in action for more than three and one-half years. This period of time is longer than any U.S. serviceman was held prisoner during World War II.

The Department of Defense continues to hope for meaningful progress on the matter of prisoner release in the Paris discussions. In the meantime, we appeal to North Vietnam and the Viet Cong to respect the humane rights of those whom they hold prisoners of war.

Specifically, we call for adherence to the Geneva Convention which requires:

1. Release of names of prisoners held.
2. Immediate release of sick and wounded prisoners.
3. Impartial inspections of prisoner of war facilities.
4. Proper treatment of all prisoners.
5. Regular flow of mail.

Most importantly, we seek the prompt release of all American prisoners.

Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird today issued the following statement:

Xuan Thuy, chief of the North Vietnam delegation to the Paris Peace Talks, has declared that Hanoi would not promptly release a list of U.S. prisoners of war held in North Vietnam.

I am deeply shocked and disappointed by this cruel response of Hanoi's representative to such a basic request for humanitarian action.

Hundreds of American wives, children and parents continue to live in a tragic state of uncertainty caused by the lack of information concerning the fate of their loved ones. This needless anxiety is caused by the persistent refusal by North Vietnam to release the names of U.S. prisoners of war.

I want to reaffirm the continuing hope that Hanoi will provide a list of American prisoners and permit a free flow of mail between U.S. prisoners of war and their families.

We continue to urge the immediate release of sick and wounded prisoners, the neutral inspection of prisoner of war facilities and the prompt release of all American prisoners.

AMBASSADOR LODGE'S STATEMENTS ON PRISONERS OF WAR DURING MAY 22 PARIS TALKS

Opening statement: I cannot leave this subject (PW's) without protesting the attitude which you have expressed most recently last Tuesday May 20, with respect to the prisoners held in North Vietnam. You have refused to provide a list of these prisoners so that their families might know whether they are living or dead. You have refused to discuss the repatriation of the sick and wounded which is a long-established international practice. You should know that the attitude you have expressed with regard to these basic humanitarian requirements cannot have a favorable effect on our negotiations here.

Additional remarks: Let me add one observation about prisoners. It is difficult to understand how you can claim to be treating our prisoners humanely when you refuse to identify the prisoners you hold so that their families can know the fate of their relatives. You refuse to permit regular mail exchanges. You reject impartial international observation of conditions under which prisoners are held: You refuse to discuss release of sick and wounded prisoners. Yet these are basic elements of humanitarian treatment under established international standards. We do not see how you can be hurt by merely publishing the names of those who are alive so that the uncertainty which their families feel may be ended. To express myself for a moment in human terms instead of the language of diplomacy, what is involved here is the prisoner's wife who does not know whether her husband is alive or whether he is dead. It is really hard to believe that the security of North Vietnam would be threatened if this wife were told the truth about her husband's fate. We hope you will reconsider your attitude on these questions so that it will truly reflect the humane policy which you claim to follow.

SECRETARY OF STATE ROGERS' NEWS CONFERENCE OF JUNE 5, 1969

The following is the State Department's release of Secretary of State William P. Rogers' news conference, which is authorized for direct quotation:

Secretary ROGERS. I want to express my serious concern about the Americans who are prisoners of war in Southeast Asia. Many of these prisoners have been held for three years or more. There is a long tradition among nations that personnel captured in wartime be treated humanely. This principle has been expressed in the Geneva Convention of 1949 and is recognized by more than 120 nations.

A basic requirement of the Convention is that names of prisoners be provided to their families and to an appropriate agency in a neutral country. Communist leaders have failed to observe this simple civilized requirement which would mean so much to the wives and families of the men who are missing in combat.

North Vietnamese officials have frequently declared that the prisoners are treated humanely. Many seriously question these statements. Assurance could readily be provided if North Viet-Nam would permit visits by impartial observers to the prison camps. For the sake of the prisoners and for their families, we continue to hope for a positive response from North Viet-Nam. We are prepared to discuss this subject and to move quickly toward arrangements for the release of prisoners on both sides, and I believe that any sign of good faith by the other side in this matter would provide encouragement for our negotiations in Paris.

STATEMENT ON PRISONERS OF WAR BY U.S. AMBASSADOR HENRY CABOT LODGE AT PARIS MEETINGS ON VIETNAM, 33D PLENARY SESSION, SEPTEMBER 13, 1969

At the last Plenary Session, I repeated our request for the humane treatment of Americans held prisoner in North Vietnam, stating that international custom, the Geneva Convention, and humanitarian considerations all require that there be impartial inspection of the prisoner of war camps, a guarantee of a regular flow of mail to and from the prisoners, and a release of the sick and wounded prisoners on both sides. In addition, a minimum regard for the peace of mind of the prisoners' next of kin requires that a list of names of the prisoners be made available so that the next of kin—who are assuredly innocent of any warlike act—at least know whether their relative is alive or dead.

To this request, the representative of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam at our last session responded—and I quote—"The question of captured American military personnel will be settled at the same time as all the other elements of the overall ten-point solution. It cannot be separated." End of quotation.

Let us now consider this answer.

In the first place, it is unresponsive. Our request at the last meeting was concerned solely with the treatment of prisoners during captivity—not with the broader question of the repartriation of prisoners. You repeat your statement that you give humanitarian treatment. But you refuse to talk about camp inspection, flow of mail, release of sick and wounded, and lists of prisoners.

In the second place, your answer is not only unresponsive; it also partakes of the irrelevant. I say this for the following reason: You say that you will not discharge your responsibilities regarding prisoner treatment until you are willing to repatriate the prisoners. But, ladies and gentlemen, when that time comes, your policy concerning treatment of prisoners will be largely academic since the prisoners will have either been repatriated or will be awaiting repatriation. The point is that prisoners are entitled to humane treatment under the protection of the Geneva Convention at all times and under all circumstances—and particularly during the period before repatriation. That is the time that counts. The point is so obvious that it should not require any statement. But your declaration at the last Plenary Session requires us to state it.

While I am on the subject, let me add that we have long been concerned by your refusal to permit impartial inspection of your prison camps. Frankly, this refusal inevitably brings up the thought that you fear that an inspection would not confirm your claims of humane treatment.

This concern has now been deepened by statements which have recently been made by two of the Americans recently released from captivity in North Vietnam. One of these Americans, Seaman Douglas B. Hegdahl, said on September 2nd—and I quote—"I was kept in solitary confinement for over a year—7 months and 10 days at a stretch. I was made to stand with my hands over my head for trying to talk with other prisoners of war." Seaman Hegdahl said—and I quote—that "many of the prisoners of war have been in solitary confinement for years"—end of quotation—and he also said—and I quote again—that "many prisoners of war do not write or receive mail." End of quotation.

Another prisoner of war, Navy Lieutenant Robert Frishman, on the same date, pointed out your failure to make available the best medical treatment and to repatriate immediately the sick and wounded. He said that the removal of his elbow had been done in a professional way, and that he was thankful still to have the right arm. However, he also pointed out—and I quote—"They failed to remove the fragments of the SAM missile in my arm. It took six months just for my incision to heal over." End of quotation. He also indicated Lieutenant Commander John McCain will require further medical treatment as soon as he returns to the United States. His remarks underline how important it is for sick and wounded prisoners to be repatriated as soon as possible.

Let me also quote what Lieutenant Frishman said about the condition of Lieutenant Commander Richard A. Stratton, another prisoner of war. He said—and I quote—"The North Vietnamese tried to get Lt. Commander Stratton to appear before a press delegation and say that he had received humane and lenient treatment. He refused because his treatment hadn't been humane. He's been tied up with ropes to such a degree that he still has large scars on his arms from rope burns which became infected. He was deprived of sleep, beaten, had his fingernails removed and put in solitary, but the North Vietnamese insisted that he make the false 'humane treatment statement' and threw him into a dark cell alone for 38 days to think about it." End of quotation.

Lieutenant Frishman also said—and I quote again—"Stratton knows that I have been released. He told me not to worry about telling the truth about him. He said that if he gets tortured some more, at least he will know why he is getting it and will feel that it will be worth the sacrifice." End of quotation. We certainly hope that neither Commander Stratton nor any of the other prisoners will suffer as a result of Lieutenant Frishman's statements.

Lieutenant Frishman further indicated that prisoners of war have been made to sit on a stool for days in a hot room until they make statements conforming to the wishes of their captors.

I can do no better than to repeat the words of Lieutenant Frishman, when he said—and I quote—"I don't think solitary confinement, forced statements, living in a cave for three years, being put in straps, not being allowed to sleep or eat, removal of fingernails, and not allowing exchange of mail to prisoners of war are humane." End of quotation. Any impartial observer—and even you yourselves, who do not consider yourselves to be impartial—must agree with this statement.

You should cease this inhuman treatment. You cannot escape the responsibility therefor.

You should also realize that your failure to act in accordance with humane practice flies in the face of world opinion as a whole.

Just this week, 101 Members of the Congress of the United States, including both Democrats and Republicans, have presented in the House of Representatives a resolution condemning your side—and I quote—for "violating the fundamental standards of human decency and grossly deviating from civilized concepts of international accords and agreements on prisoners of war." End of quotation. In addition, 96 Members of the House of Representatives have signed a statement protesting your—and I quote—"inhumane and inexcusable"—unquote—conduct with regard to the Americans you hold prisoner.

The Twenty-First International Red Cross Conference, composed of the parties to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, is now meeting in Istanbul, Turkey. The International Humanitarian Law Commission of that Conference has adopted without dissent a resolution calling for humane treatment of prisoners of war. The resolution states that the Geneva Prisoner of War Convention—and I quote—"applies to each armed conflict between two or more parties to the Convention without regard to how the conflict may be characterized." End of quotation. The resolution also calls up—and I quote—"all authorities involved in an armed conflict to ensure that all uniformed members of the regular armed forces of another party to the conflict and all other persons entitled to prisoner of war status are accorded the humane treatment and the full measure of protection prescribed by the Convention, including free access to the prisoners of war and all places of their detention by a protecting power or by the International Committee of the Red Cross.

If I may, I will depart from my prepared statement for just a moment to say that I have just received word during the recess that the International Red Cross Conference in Istanbul this morning passed this resolution without dissent by a vote of a hundred fourteen to nothing.

In contrast with your treatment of the prisoners whom you hold, consider the many thousands of your military personnel held in prisoner of war camps administered by the Republic of Vietnam. In accordance with the Geneva Convention, the Government of the Republic of Vietnam has provided lists of prisoners' names to the International Committee of the Red Cross. The prisoners are allowed to correspond with their families. These camps conform to the standards established by the Geneva Convention, and they are visited frequently by representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross, who inspect them thoroughly and hold private interviews with prisoners. A number of sick and wounded prisoners have been released, and our side has expressed willingness to make arrangements for the release of all seriously sick or wounded prisoners.

STATEMENT BY HENRY CABOT LODGE, NOVEMBER 24, 1969

I consider it necessary to comment on an article in the press in which Mr. Xuan Thuy, the North Vietnamese representative, is reported to have made certain allegations concerning the United States position at these Paris meetings.

First, it is not true that I have not been willing to meet privately or otherwise, with Mr. Thuy to discuss general problems concerning Viet Nam—and he knows it very well.

Second, it is also not true that in the private meetings which have been held, I have only been willing to talk on only one question—that of mutual troop withdrawal. He knows that, too.

Third, it is not true, as alleged, that the U.S. wishes to continue the war in Viet-Nam and is therefore inflexible.

The facts are that Mr. Thuy has been as intransigent in private meetings as he has been in public meetings. He has avoided engaging in any give and take. Instead his position has been to insist on the U.S. withdrawing completely from South Viet-Nam without any indication of what the North Vietnamese would do. He has also demanded that the U.S. overthrow the present government in South Viet-Nam as we leave.

For our part, we have made it clear that—far from rejecting—we are willing to discuss all questions relevant to peace. We have made every effort to have the parties concerned discuss all the issues. We have made our proposals and we have indicated that we are willing to discuss the proposals made by the other side. Contrary to the position of the other side, we do not make proposals on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

At one stage we set forth a list of all the subjects—military and political—that needed discussion if there was to be a peaceful settlement of the conflict. We also invited the other side to clarify their own proposals.

We got nowhere because they either refused to consider our proposals—or demanded that we take unilateral actions without any parallel action by them. And they even declined to have any serious discussion in which the government of South Viet-Nam could participate.

Mr. Thuy has tried to make it appear as if he has all along been ready to meet privately for serious discussion. The fact is that every private meeting which we have held has been at the request of the United States. If Mr. Thuy had any desire to meet he managed to conceal that desire very well.

For my part, I sought through every means to engage the other side in genuine negotiations on all issues. The Government of the Republic of Viet-Nam has also been willing to talk about any subject without prior conditions.

I shall not speculate on the purposes Mr. Thuy may have in mind in making his allegations. But these allegations are untrue and I believe he knows that they are untrue. There has never been any doubt that the United States has been ready to meet and to negotiate meaningfully at any time and in any meeting place. The same is true of the Republic of Viet-Nam.

That has been true in the past, it is true today, and will be true in the future. But negotiation is not a process by which he can make demands and then only be willing to discuss our acceptance of those demands. I also submit that negotiations are not helped by making false charges which are bound to complicate the problem.

STATEMENT BY AMBASSADOR GRAHAM MARTIN, CHAIRMAN OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT DELEGATION, XXIST INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF THE RED CROSS, ISTANBUL, TURKEY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1969

Those of you who were present at the Twentieth International Conference of the Red Cross in Vienna in October 1965, will recall that the Conference expressed its concern for the treatment of prisoners of war whose confinement removed them from combat and whose presence presented no threat to their captors. The armed conflicts that existed at that time and the conduct of some governments who have acceded to the Geneva Conventions in failing to honor their obligations under the Conventions to provide humane treatment to prisoners of war, showed the need for the resolution which the Conference passed four years ago.

Now four long years have passed since the adoption of that resolution, which called "upon all authorities involved in an armed conflict to ensure that every prisoner of war is given the treatment and full measure of protection prescribed by the Geneva Convention of 1949 . . . ." In the case of the Communist authorities in southeast Asia, the solemn appeal of the last conference fell on deaf ears. North Vietnam and the Viet Cong have refused consistently to observe even internationally recognized minimum standards of humanitarian treatment for prisoners they hold as a result of the armed conflict in Vietnam.

The concern of the United States about these prisoners has been expressed by President Nixon and also by Ambassador Lodge at the Paris Peace Talks. Secretary of State Rogers and Secretary of Defense Laird also have repeatedly publicly expressed urgent concern about the failure of the Communist authorities in Vietnam to live up to the humanitarian standards of the Convention and to treat humanely personnel who have fallen into their hands.

The concern of these highest officers of the United States is universally shared by all the American people. I am glad to note that we are not alone in our concern. Speaking in London on March 19, Jacques Freymond of the ICRC, said concerning the work of the committee:

"In Vietnam, it has so far had limited success. In fact, in spite of repeated representations, it has not been able to obtain the agreement of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam to the installation of a delegation in Hanoi nor even to the visiting of prisoners of war.

"The Hanoi authorities have, it is true, assured the ICRC that these prisoners are treated humanely by them. The committee has therefore had to content itself with sending medicines, medical equipment and, more recently, two field hospitals to the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

Mr. Freymond went on to say:

"On the other hand, the ICRC is represented in Saigon and the delegates are able to visit all prisoner of war camps. They also regularly receive nominal rolls of these prisoners."

I might add that the Government of the Republic of Vietnam, in cooperation with its allies, has placed great emphasis on proper treatment of prisoners of war captured by allied forces.

Today, in September 1969, I have the sad duty to report to you that we have seen that the Communist authorities in southeast Asia have refused to cooperate with the ICRC. We also know as a fact that North Vietnam is violating every basic provision of the prisoner of war convention it signed and is in fact seriously mistreating our men it holds as prisoners. We are deeply concerned and outraged by this grave affront to human dignity and international responsibility.

When I said that we know that our men who are captured in Vietnam are being mistreated, I spoke with the assurance of unmistakable evidence—a touching witness provided by one who had himself actually been subjected to this savage and inhumane treatment. Since the time of the last conference we have known that North Vietnam was refusing to provide the names of all the men it held as prisoners, and that they have refused to permit impartial inspection of its prisoner facilities by the ICRC or any other impartial intermediary. It has long been obvious that prisoners have been denied or severely restricted in their right to communicate with their families. The hundreds of waiting families who do not even know if their man is alive today are sad witnesses to this fact. We also have seen the North Vietnamese release photographs of seriously sick or wounded prisoners who should be repatriated immediately.

Today we have confirmation of what has been an even greater concern for us—our men are being seriously, physically and mentally mistreated. The men whom North Vietnam recently chose to release have, in spite of threats by their captors, felt duty bound to tell the world how North Vietnam treats its prisoners. Their story is not a pleasant one and it pleads for prompt and strong action by this Conference. North Vietnam denies universally accepted standards of humanitarian treatment for prisoners and violates the provisions of the Geneva Convention to which it acceded by:

(1) Refusing to identify the prisoners it holds and account for those missing in North Vietnam.

(2) Torturing prisoners both physically and mentally.

(3) Keeping prisoners in isolation cut off from their fellow prisoners and from the outside world.

(4) Failing to provide an adequate diet.

(5) Failing to repatriate the seriously sick or wounded.

(6) Refusing to permit impartial inspection of prisoner facilities by the ICRC or another appropriate intermediary.

(7) Using prisoners for propaganda purposes.

(8) Denying regular exchange of mail between all prisoners and their families.

(9) Failing to provide adequate medical care to all prisoners in need of treatment.

May I ask you to hear the actual words of Lt. Robert F. Frishman, USN, one of the prisoners recently released by North Vietnam. On September 2, 1969, less than a fortnight ago, from our Naval hospital in Bethesda where he is recovering from his ordeal, he had this to say:

"My intentions are not to scare wives and families but Hanoi has given false impressions that all is wine and roses and it isn't so. All I'm interested in is for Hanoi to live up to their claims of humane and lenient treatment of prisoners of war. I don't think solitary confinement, forced statements, living in a cage for three years, being put in straps, not being allowed to sleep or eat, removal of fingernails, being hung from a ceiling, having an infected arm which was almost lost, not receiving medical care, being dragged along the ground with a broken leg, or not allowing an exchange of mail to prisoners of war are humane.

"Why don't they send out a list of their prisoners of war? Why do they try to keep us from even seeing each other? Certain prisoners of war have received publicity. Others are kept silent. Why aren't their names officially released? If they don't have any secondary alternatives or motives in mind, then release the names of the prisoners of war so their families will know their loved ones' status. I feel as if I am speaking not only for myself, but for my buddies back in camp to whom I promised I would tell the truth. I feel it is time people are aware of the facts."

Lt. Frishman was addressing his own people in America. But it is time for the world to know these facts. Therefore, I share Lt. Frishman's words with you gathered here in this Conference.

In the most recent provisional activity report submitted to this Conference by the ICRC, it is stated that "on 3 June 1969 the ICRC again wrote the Government of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam reminding it of the obligations incumbent on it in accordance with the 1949 Geneva Conventions for the protection of war victims." And at our opening session the distinguished new President of the ICRC reported to us that North Vietnam had not yet allowed any representative of the ICRC to enter its territory.

Each of us has a moral duty to see that signers of the Convention honor the internationally accepted principles of humane treatment of prisoners of war. We trust that this conference, which has a fundamental and abiding interest in the Geneva Prisoner of War Convention will declare itself clearly and unequivocally concerning the humane treatment of prisoners—all prisoners in all parts of the world. The resolution before us was carefully drafted by the co-sponsors to insure the universality of its coverage to all prisoners of war wherever held, by whatever nation, great or small. We hope, therefore, that all national delegations and all national societies will join those nations and national societies which have already sponsored this resolution. We believe, Mr. Chairman, it should be supported unanimously.

TEXT OF IDENTICAL HOUSE RESOLUTIONS ON U.S. PRISONERS OF WAR IN NORTH VIETNAM

Including: H. Con. Res. 3558–H. Con. Res. 365; H. Con. Res. 373, H. Con. Res. 385, H. Con. Res. 414, H. Con. Res. 431.

Expressing the sense of Congress with respect to North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam complying with the requirements of the Geneva Convention.

Whereas the United States Government and the Republic of Vietnam have continuously honored the requirements of the Geneva Convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war; and

Whereas the United States Government has repeatedly appealed to North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam to respect the requirements of the Geneva Convention, which North Vietnam has endorsed; and

Whereas the North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam have disregarded the provisions of the Geneva Convention and refused to release the names of prisoners of war who are members of the Armed Forces of the United States, to permit the regular flow of mail to or from those prisoners, and otherwise to accord humane treatment to those prisoners, and to permit inspection of the facilities in which those prisoners are held: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate Concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that the President, the Department of State, the Department of Defense, and all other concerned departments or agencies of the United States Government, the United Nations, and the peoples of the world should appeal to North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam to comply with the requirements of the Geneva Convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war and to take such steps as may be appropriate to obtain the humane treatment and prompt release of all members of the Armed Forces of the United States so held as prisoners of war.

TEXT OF IDENTICAL HOUSE RESOLUTIONS ON U.S. PRISONERS OF WAR IN NORTH VIETNAM

Including: H. Con. Res. 332-H. Con. Res 337; H. Con. Res. 339, 349–350, 352, 370, 383–384, 389, 413.

Condemning the treatment of American prisoners of war by the Government of North Vietnam and urging the President to initiate appropriate action for the purpose of insuring that American prisoners are accorded humane treatment.

Whereas there are at least three hundred and forty and possibly one thousand two hundred American servicemen interned as prisoners of war by the Government of North Vietnam and its allies in South Vietnam; and

Whereas some of these American prisoners have been held captive for as long as five years; and

Whereas intelligence reports and reports from American servicemen who have been released or escaped from such imprisonment indicate that American servicemen, while so imprisoned, are subjected to unusual, cruel and inhumane treatment, to wit: physical torture, psychological terror, public display, insufficient medical care and treatment, neglect of health, dietary and sanitary necessities, prohibition of correspondence with relatives, and forced compliance with propaganda and political exploitation; and

Whereas by inflicting such treatment on American prisoners of war the Government of North Vietnam and its allies in South Vietnam have violated the fundamental standards of human decency and have grossly deviated from civilized concepts of international accords and agreements on prisoners of war: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress condemns the treatment of American prisoners of war by the Government of North Vietnam and its allies in South Vietnam, and hereby urges the President to initiate, diligently through diplomatic, military, and any other available channels, such action as may be necessary to insure that the tenets of fair and humane treatment, as expressed in the Geneva Convention of 1949, which was signed by the Government of North Vietnam in 1957, are accorded to American servicemen held as prisoners of war in North and South Vietnam and especially to require the Government of North Vietnam and its allies to (1) identify prisoners whom they hold, (2) release seriously sick or injured prisoners, (3) permit impartial inspections of all prisoner of war facilities, and (4) permit the free exchange of mail between families and prisoners.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KEITH).

Mr. KEITH. Thank you. Mr. Chairman, I do not anticipate using but a moment of the 4 minutes I am alloted.

Mr. Chairman, at the time of the Tonkin Gulf resolution the rules under which the House operated did not permit the extensive exploration of the end results of the course of action which we sanctioned at that time. Had we more fully debated it, we might have anticipated some of the events that history has since revealed.

I feel the resolution before us today might very well have had a more open rule. I feel the extrication of our forces from Vietnam, now that we are committed there, is just as serious in its long range implications as was the initial commitment of our troops to the mainland of Asia.

So I simply want to advise my colleagues in the House and my constituents that I feel the long-range results of the withdrawal anticipated by our President need to have fuller debate than they have had and that much more light could have been shed on the subject if we had had an open rule.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may propound a question to the chairman of the subcommittee?

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time to the minority side.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. EDMONDSON).

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma 2 additional minutes.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Chairman, I support the resolution which has as its principal objective the construction of a base of national unity in support of the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

At the beginning of my brief time in this debate, let me say a word about the origin of this resolution.

It did not originate in the White House and it did not originate with the leadership on either side of this House.

This resolution is the product of a Member of this House—the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT). Ninety-nine percent of its language is the language of JIM WRIGHT. The two or three changes in that language suggested to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) were all suggested by other Democrats in this House—and were matters of form and not substance.

As a Democrat, I am proud of the origin of this resolution, proud of the spirit which motivates it, and proud of its objectives.

It has been conceived in the highest tradition of our party—a party which has always contended that partisan politics should stop at the water's edge—and I am proud that a majority of Democrats joined in cosponsoring this resolution.

There are some who have criticized it by saying it will strengthen the President domestically—and who say this is not desirable, since the President belongs to another party.

I have campaigned against the man who is our President three times in national elections. I have been cochairman of our national party's speakers' bureau three times in the last 14 years, and I enjoy partisan politics as much as anyone I know. I have no doubt that our President, as leader of his party, will be out in Oklahoma next November urging Second District voters—as he has done twice before—to send a Republican to Congress.

Nonetheless, Mr. Chairman, I believe with all my heart that this resolution should be adopted, and adopted overwhelmingly by this House. Its adoption, in my judgment, will be the most important step our Nation has taken in a long time toward a united approach toward solution of the Vietnam problem.

It is a constitutional fact that only one public official can negotiate with full authority for the Nation to conclude a settlement of that problem. No Senator or Congressman—however wise or well-intentioned—can perform that duty which is placed constitutionally in the President.

The resolution we debate does not increase or diminish that constitutional authority and duty—but it does place this House formerly on record in support of our Chief Executive's efforts to get the job done.

In taking that position, the resolution "approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body."

Is there anything unacceptable or divisive about that statement?

The right of the people of South Vietnam to decide their own fate in free elections was firmly stated in the 1968 Democratic national platform—and without such a guarantee I do not believe it is possible to withdraw from Vietnam without dishonor to the memory of 40,000 Americans who have fallen there.

President Nixon, like President Eisenhower and President Kennedy and President Johnson, shares that conviction and publicly supports that principle. The right of a free people to self-determination is a right which Americans have treasured since the Declaration of Independence. The President and the resolution honor our finest heritage by restating that principle.

At the same time, the President has firmly stated his intention to withdraw our troops from Vietnam at the earliest time possible, and more than 60,000 already have been withdrawn ahead of the President's announced schedule.

I believe withdrawal of these troops is strong evidence at this time of the President's good faith in bringing an end to American involvement in Vietnam. At the same time, I am convinced that the President commands the support of most American citizens in his determination to conclude a peaceful and just settlement in the process of withdrawal—a settlement, in final analysis, that does not abandon an elected, anti-Communist South Vietnamese Government fighting for survival against invading Communist forces, without assurance that the aggression has been ended and peaceful elections agreed to, or, on the other hand, that the South Vietnamese Government is ready to deal with that aggression with its own combat forces.

Evidence is increasing daily of South Vietnamese ability to do just that, and not many months ago a number of us had lunch with a group of South Vietnamese Congressmen who were confident of their government's ability to assume that full burden during the year 1970.

I hope and pray their confidence proves fully justified, but I share the view of the President and leaders of our Committee on Foreign Affairs that the course of peaceful negotiations in Vietnam will not be served well by enactment of a legislative timetable in this resolution.

The resolution speaks for itself and stands on its own merits.

Throughout this debate I have heard very little criticism of the terms of this resolution. I believe it has been demonstrated that the resolution is understandable and acceptable to a great majority of the membership of this House—and that it can serve as a foundation for national unity both understandable and acceptable to a great majority of our constitutents.

Trial lawyers in this body will remember the old saying about the trial of a lawsuit: "When the facts are against you, talk about the law. When the law is against you, talk about the facts. And, when both the facts and the law are against you, talk about the court."

Opponents of this resolution have largely "talked about the court" in this debate. They have been critical of procedure in committee, critical of the rule, and critical of programing of the resolution. They have had very little to say about the resolution itself, and the unifying purpose it serves.

Reference has already been made in this debate to the fact that former Ambassador Harriman, speaking to a group of Democrats last week, had stated that he would not vote for this resolution.

Ambassador Harriman's political advice is always appreciated, but it was far more significant to me that Ambassador Harriman, at the same meeting and in response to a direct question, said he would have liked to have had such a resolution passed by the House while he was negotiating on the Vietnam question in Paris.

Obviously, the Ambassador would have considered such a resolution helpful in 1968.

Just as obviously—and notwithstanding the Ambassador's political advice—the resolution will prove helpful to our negotiators in Paris in 1969.

The President, in an unprecedented visit to this Chamber, has expressed to this entire House his personal appreciation for the resolution and the assistance which it is sure to afford in negotiations.

If this resolution is helpful to our Paris negotiators, and is helpful to our President in concluding a just peace in Vietnam—then surely it is a resolution which is deserving of overwhelming support in this House.

Regardless of whether you agree or not with the President's domestic policies—and I disagree with him on many of those policies—and regardless of whether you approve or disapprove of the speech on November 3—and I found the speech unnecessarily partisan on some points—the fact remains that this resolution states firmly what needs to be said by this Nation's elected representatives at this time.

"We support the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam."

Let us enact the resolution, and on this base, let us do all in our power to unite the country.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDSON. I am pleased to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT).

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Oklahoma and to express my personal appreciation to the gentleman not only for the very excellent statement which he is making, the very sensible and very timely statement that he is making at this moment, but also for the dedicated help and assistance and cooperation that he gave to the other sponsors and proponents of this resolution. The gentleman from Oklahoma was the very first person with whom I discussed the original draft, and he assisted in perfecting the language of the resolution.

Without the unerringly good counsel, the advice and the energetic, imaginative, and effective help of the gentleman from Oklahoma from its very inception, this resolution would not have reached this point of progression today.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Oklahoma for his dedicated, patriotic and deeply sincere efforts.

Mr. EDMONDSON. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRASER. I want to commend the gentleman for his very good statement.

However, is there anything contained in this resolution which is different from the objectives which were stated by President Johnson as to our involvement in Vietnam? In other words, does this resolution contain an objective different from that as stated by President Johnson during his tenure in office?

Mr. EDMONDSON. In terms of Presidential statements with regard to policies in Vietnam I, personally, do not see any difference of any magnitude in the position consistently taken by President Johnson and the position that has been asserted by the present President of the United States in the November 3 speech with regard to his policy.

Mr. FRASER. The view of the gentleman then would be that this resolution in effect is a continuation of the objectives that President Johnson had?

Mr. EDMONDSON. With this substantial difference—that President Nixon has not only announced a policy of withdrawal at the earliest practical time, but has begun this withdrawal and has accomplished the withdrawal of 60,000 troops. I believe this action represents a rather significant and important difference, and I believe when we support the President in what he is doing in this regard that we help the position of the President in negotiating a just settlement.

Mr. FRASER. The gentleman would agree that the resolution is silent as to the policy of withdrawal, and that efforts to amend the resolution to include a statement on withdrawal were defeated both in committee and through the attempt to change the rule?

Mr. EDMONDSON. The resolution is silent on a good many points that have been stated as principles, by President Johnson, President Kennedy, and President Nixon. On the other hand, one can go back to President Kennedy's statements and find support for practically everything that is stated in this resolution.

Mr. FRASER. The only thing I want to do, and I do not want to take the time of the gentleman, is to indicate that on the one change in policy from President Johnson the resolution is silent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ECKHARDT).

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I will yield briefly to the gentleman in just one moment.

First, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I was also present at the time when Ambassador Harriman was speaking, and I did not understand in his answers any of the connotations favoring the resolution which have been indicated here.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, since I anticipated that the gentleman from Oklahoma might again quote Governor Harriman, I have discussed the matter today with Governor Harriman and am authorized to quote him as follows:

> Asking me whether I would have liked to have such a resolution is like asking me whether I would have liked applause for a speech or a word of approval for something I was doing. But I do not believe the adoption of the resolution will have any effect on the Paris negotiations.

Mr. ECKHARDT. I recall that. And I recall that Ambassador Harriman said that he thought it was most improvident to offer a resolution at this time.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ECKHARDT. I will yield to the gentleman if the gentleman can get me a little more time, as I believe I am nearly running my time out as of now.

Mr. EDMONDSON. I will certainly attempt to get additional time for the gentleman.

Mr. ECKHARDT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will agree that I have never at any time stated that Ambassador Harriman favored the passage of this resolution today. I think it is very clear he does not, but it is equally clear on the record, without any misunderstanding, that Ambassador Harriman said as a negotiator he would have liked to have had it passed.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Had he been following the same course of negotiations, I assume, but he most assuredly disagreed with the approach taken.

However, I am prepared to support House Resolution 613 upon the assurances made by its proponents yesterday and today that it does not in any way tie the sense of Congress to the President's speech of November 3 as to any ultimate policy decisions with respect to war or peace, and does not purport to shirk the duty of the Congress to maintain at all times its oversight and review of such policies and decisions.

Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a statement signed by a few other Members and myself, which I shall ask leave in the House to add at the end of this statement to the same effect.

I would like to say though, as to the provisions and the watering down of this resolution in debate, that it is most difficult for me to see that this resolution adds anything to the present approach toward peace. In fact, approximately the same thing was said by Dean Rusk in 1967.

When I first received a copy of this resolution, I started to write to my good friend, the gentleman from Texas, saying that I had left, laying in my box, a resolution that must have been received in 1967 and must have been wrongly dated—because the resolution would have been meaningful at that time. I fail to see how we bring Hanoi closer to the bargaining table by a resolution that calls for almost the same things that were called for in 1967.

I realize that we can have but one president at a time, but why must we have a presidential learning process that operates in tandem?

The only way we are going to resolve this situation, it seems to me, is by regular and measured withdrawals, forthwith, of sufficient troops from the field in order to bring about a broadening of the Saigon government—a government which can bring about and maintain peace, not act as a proxy to continue the war.

Mr. Chairman, the statement to which I referred, signed by myself and 10 others, appears below:

STATEMENT QUALIFYING VOTE ON HOUSE RESOLUTION 613—HOW THE PRESIDENT COMMANDEERED A DEMOCRATIC RESOLUTION

On November 4, H. Res. 612 by Mr. Wright of Texas, and H. Res. 613 by Mr. Hays of Ohio were introduced in the House. Three hundred ten Members of the House in these and identical resolutions affirmed "support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam," approved and supported "the principles enunciated by the President," and supported the President "in his call upon the government of North Vietnam to announce its willingness" to honor elections and resolve controversies in accordance with the President's proposals. Mr. Wright has said that the resolutions were intended as general, non-partisan support of the Presidency in his "efforts to negotiate peace." (Also see Committee Report, p. 1.)

But since the resolutions were introduced on the day after the President addressed the Nation, they were vulnerable to interpretation as a sweeping, prior endorsement of such policies, programs, and demands as might unfold in the present and future conduct of the foreign policy of the Nation. Exploiting such vulnerability, the President on November 13, in what he himself called "perhaps an unprecedented procedure," appeared before the House and embraced what had come to be called the Wright-Hays Resolution (H. Res. 613). He stated that it went along the lines of a proposal made in a speech of November 3, and he characterized it as showing that "a majority [were] supporting the policy of the President of the United States."

Therefore the posture of the Resolution in this political context is now changed. Members who had co-sponsored it, along with those who had refrained from doing so, feel that certain basic points must be made to clarify a common position taken by the undersigned. This is particularly true in view of the fact that within about 48 hours after H. Res. 613's introduction, the House Foreign Affairs Committee, in an executive session, reported it out and the Rules Committee has submitted it to the floor under a closed rule.

WHY THE UNDERSIGNED MUST QUALIFY A VOTE OF "AYE" OR "NO"

All of the undersigned entertain the fondest hope that the President will exert all "his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam," all hope that "free election open to all Vietnamese" will ultimately determine political control there, as it should in the rest of the world, and all favor, generally, the influence of "impartial and international" bodies in seeking such ends in Vietnam, as elsewhere in the world. Above all, the undersigned fervently desire that the "controvery—be peacefully—resolved in order that the war may be ended and peace be restored at last in Southeast Asia." Therefore many of the undersigned will vote "aye" but with deep concern about the process by which it has come to the House and with the same reservations as those voting "No."

But additionally, all the undersigned strongly believe that ultimate policy decisions respecting war and peace must continue to be the function of Congress, and it is the duty of Congress to maintain at all times its oversight and review of such policy decisions without delegating the same to any other authority. It is not appropriate nor is it consonant with the authority and dignity of Congress to give any general affirmation to an existing and continuing course of action of the Presidency so as to erode such role of Congress.

Because many feel that the Resolution has an element of such "general affirmation" of an ill-formed policy of the President, a large number of the undersigned are voting against the Resolution.

All of us feel that the Resolution is without much real substance and that it has been employed largely as a political gambit. We feel that Congress should take a more affirmative stand in its proper role as formulator of U.S. policy, both domestic and foreign. In this respect we affirmatively urge—

(1) Efforts to reduce the level of violence in Vietnam;

(2) The broadening of the political base of the Saigon government; and

(3) The immediate designation of a high-level replacement for retiring delegate Henry Cabot Lodge.

Bob Eckhardt, George Brown, Henry Helstoski, James Howard, Edward Koch, Peter Kyros, John Moss, Lucien Nedzi, James Scheuer, Morris Udall, and Jerome Waldie.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY).

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Chairman, I support this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, as a cosponsor of this resolution I urge its overwhelming approval. Once we had a saying in this country that "politics stops at the water's edge."

It was a pretty good saying and went right along with the theory of the times that U.S. foreign policy ought to be bipartisan, that our Nation's best interests in the world community of nations were served best when members and leaders of both parties united behind the President.

Neither the first saying nor the second theory prevented or were meant to prevent honest diflerences of opinion or legitimate debate on world issues.

But they did serve as guidelines for responsible Congressmen in both parties during times of international crisis involving our country.

Thus we pretty generally united behind President Wilson in World War I. We generally stood behind President Roosevelt in World War II. And we united behind President Truman in the undeclared Korean war.

But, Mr. Chairman, somewhere since then we have lost the feeling of being a unified nation, even as we fight to honor our commitments in South Vietnam.

Today there are those among us who not only disagree with the President, but who also seek to provoke active dissent and in same cases violence. Their purpose is not only to show their disagreement, but actually to force the President into taking actions he knows are contrary to the best interests of our Nation.

Unfortunately, in the recent past the so-called "silent majority" and many who represent them have stood by and let this happen.

Because they have done so, the world has been given a totally false picture. Too often others now see us as a nation torn by dissent, split into factions and hardly able any more to govern ourselves.

Fortunately this is not true.

Those who seek to destroy the President, those who seek unconditional surrender for the United States and a corollary victory for the Communists of North Vietnam make up only a small percentage of our country.

And those in the Congress who profess to speak for the dissenters and who join with them in their retreat from reality make up a very small percentage of the Congress. They not only have misled themselves they have misled the rest of the world.

What these countries fail to understand, however, is that the right of dissent is part of the peculiar nature of our democratic traditions. The success of this democracy in every crisis in the past has hinged on our ability to unite in spite of our differences. In the case of the war in South Vietnam, it has endured one of its most severe tests.

As a proponent of the Vietnam resolution, I believe that passage of this statement will clarify any doubts these nations may have as to our intentions, our unity, and significantly enhance the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Southeast Asia.

Therefore, the ramifications of this measure, should it receive congressional consent are most important both nationally and internationally. Besides formally vocalizing House support for the President's policy, ratification of the Vietnam resolution will be an indicative action to the nations of the world on where the American people stand on this issue.

The image of American unity that would be projected by the passage of the Vietnam resolution is not one that is trumped up or intended to whitewash American sentiment on the Vietnam war. I believe that it would be a true reflection of the feelings of the bulk of the American people who have paid dearly for this war and want peace not only for themselves but also for the people of Southeast Asia.

Extensive bipartisan support of this resolution would indicate that it is not merely an exercise in party politics nor a simple rubberstamp approval of the President's policy. Instead, passage of the Vietnam resolution would manifest that my colleagues in the House and their constituents believe that politics, even today, should stop at the water's edge.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, we have learned from experience—I would say grim experience—that resolutions of the House sometimes are used as justification for measures never contemplated by those who voted for them. The Tonkin resolution of 1964 is an example. It was often cited by President Johnson as a congressional mandate for war measures in Vietnam.

Several speakers yesterday asserted, I was glad to note, that House Resolution 613 conveys absolutely no authority to the President beyond that he already possesses, and does not authorize the employment of military measure in any form.

The author of the resolution, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), would do us all a great favor, I feel, if he would clarify the intent of some of the words by answering a few questions.

On line seven are the words "approves and supports." The word "approves" is easily understood, but the word "supports" is something else. Support can take many forms—military action, diplomatic initiatives, public statements.

It is my belief that the use of the word "supports" does not contemplate the use of the military measures in any form whatsoever, and therefore is totally related to nonmilitary measures. Am I correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, the verb "supports" must be read in context with the object of the predicate. The Congress by this resolution approves and supports "the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections."

It might be said that American troops are presently engaged in supporting that principle by military means. However, this resolution affirms our support for the President's efforts to negotiate a peace embodying that cardinal principle. In one sense, this principle is what the war is all about. President Nixon has indicated his conviction that it is the one indispensable basis for a just peace. This resolution declares that the House of Representatives approves and supports that principle and shares that conviction.

Mr. FINDLEY. This response confirms my belief that this use of the word "supports" is totally related to nonmilitary measures. For further clarification of that same point, in regard to the section the gentleman just read. "supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government, government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body," do not represent an endorsement of U.S. military measures to accomplish and sustain those conditions. Am I correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. The resolution makes no comment on military measures. It does not constitute military advice.

Mr. FINDLEY. Is there any implication that it is an endorsement of military measures to accomplish and to sustain those conditions, that is the conditions of free elections and the possibility of an impartial international body supervising such?

Mr. WRIGHT. The resolution deals only in the most indirect and inferential manner with any use of military force, simply in the sense that what we are attempting to find is the means of stopping the war on a basis of a settlement which would be worthy of the sacrifices already made and in harmony with our own most cherished convictions.

We believe that the avenue to a peaceful settlement lies through free elections and that is what the resolution addresses itself to.

Mr. FINDLEY. Would it be fair to make this assumption—that the resolution cannot properly be construed to deal in any way, direct or indirect, with the use of military force by the United States? Is that a fair assumption?

Mr. WRIGHT. My answer is the same as it has been to the two previous questions asked by the gentleman. It supports the principle that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections.

That is what the resolution says; that is what the resolution means.

Mr. FINDLEY. But it is not intended to justify the use of military force to accomplish that objective; am I correct in that statement?

Mr. WRIGHT. It says nothing about the use of military force. Whether that basic, cardinal principle which the resolution supports could initially have been vouchsafed and protected without the use of any military force is at this point, it seems to me, a moot question. The resolution states that the House agrees with the President in his efforts to secure a negotiated settlement which will embrace the principle of free and fair elections. By "efforts" we refer in the resolution to nonmilitary efforts. We speak of negotiating efforts. The words are "efforts to negotiate a just peace." That is all the resolution speaks of.

Mr. FINDLEY. The language of the resolution has caused the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) to raise what I believe to be an important point. The inference could be made from the language of the resolution that the House wishes South Vietnam to be permanently separated from North Vietnam. I do not believe the gentleman from Texas, or any of the sponsors of the resolution, intended to leave that impression. A clearly stated objective of the Geneva Accords of 1954 was the eventual unification of Vietnam, and to the best of my knowledge and belief the United States is unequivocally pledged to that objective. Am I correct that the language of the resolution should not be interpreted as an attempt to modify U.S. support for eventual unification of Vietnam?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is nothing in the resolution which insists upon a permanent separation of the two Vietnams. There is nothing in the resolution which precludes the possibility of eventual unification. I can speak only as one Member. My hope is that any such possible future unification would be based upon a manifest willingness of the majority of the people of both North Vietnam and South Vietnam to determine their own future by the electoral process. If unification is to come, it should come through elections, not through military force.

Mr. FINDLEY. Shortly after introducing the resolution before us, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) sent around a series of questions and answers to allay any apprehensions which Members might have over the wording and the intention of this resolution on Vietnam policy. In the absence of hearings on this resolution, this discussion provided by the gentleman is helpful and appreciated, and I would like to have Mr. WRIGHT's questions and answers included in my remarks at this point:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON H. RES. 613 TOWARD PEACE WITH JUSTICE IN VIETNAM

Q: Why is this resolution necessary at this time?

A: News from Paris makes it increasingly more clear by the day that there must be an affirmative statement expressing some basic unity of purpose in the United States if there is to be any progress toward genuine negotiation.

It takes two to negotiate. Obviously Hanoi's leaders think they can simply wait us out. Their statements in Paris repeatedly bristle with references to dissent and disunity on the American home front and gratuitous conclusions that the American people do not support the President. Apparently they really believe that we are on the verge of actual internal collapse—and that therefore they shouldn't even try to negotiate, but merely wait for us to give in on all of their demands. This attitude clearly is stalling negotiations and prolonging the war.

Who but the Congress—and particularly the House which most directly represents the people—can clearly and credibly correct that misimpression? Only when Hanoi and the Vietcong understand that there is a basic underlying sense of unity in the United States will they take seriously anything our negotiators say. Only then can there be progress toward a negotiated settlement.

Q: Now, really, didn't the White House initiate the request for this resolution?

A: Absolutely not. This resolution, from its very inception, has been a Congressional initiative. Interestingly enough, the idea originated among Democratic members. The initial draft was drawn up by a Democrat. Minor changes were made at the suggestions of Congressmen Holifield, Hays and Speaker McCormack. It then was discussed with Jerry Ford and Ross Adair. A copy was sent to the White House for comment, and the White House responded with an expression of deep and sincere appreciation. But no person in the Executive Branch suggested one single word in the resolution or asked for one single change! It is wholly the work of the House.

Q: Is this another "Gulf of Tonkin" resolution? Could it be so interpreted?

A: Absolutely not. It is clearly distinguishable from the Gulf of Tonkin resolution on at least three counts: (1) Its thrust is entirely toward peace, not war. The Tonkin resolution specifically refers to acts of military reprisal ("all necessary steps, including the use of armed force"). The present resolution explicitly supports and encourages the President in his efforts to negotiate peace. (2) The Tonkin resolution, by inference at least, seemed to broaden Presidential powers ("the United States is prepared, as the President determines, to take all necessary steps . . ."). Nothing in the present resolution could be in any way so construed. (3) The Tonkin resolution implied approval for future acts by the Executive (". . . all necessary measures"). This resolution, by contrast, explicitly refers to actions already taken and positions already expressed. It is not "open ended."

Q: Does this amount to a whitewash of the Saigon regime?

A: Not at all. While demonstrating to Hanoi that we are not on the verge of collapse, it also reminds Saigon that we are committed to solution by truly fair and free elections open to all South Vietnamese.

Q: Shouldn't we include some expression urging the President to withdraw American troops more rapidly?

A: It would seriously dilute the message to do so. As Commander-in-Chief, the President must make those decisions on the basis of current information available to him on a day-to-day basis. The House cannot presume foreknowledge of future military possibilities. The resolution does make approving reference to "numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith." These obviously include the cessation of bombing ordered by President Johnson and the systematic troop reductions initiated by President Nixon. The House is not attempting herein to advise the President on military matters. It is expressing support for his efforts to negotiate peace.

Q. Shouldn't there have been lengthy hearings in the Foreign Affairs Committee?

A. This is an expression of the House. There is no reason why we should seek advice or testimony from outside sources. Among the resolution's cosponsors are 25 members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. After all the months of our concern with this issue and the literally millions of words that have been spoken on the floor of the House, surely every member knows how he feels on a question so basic as this. If any member of the House still has no opinion, it is doubtful that lengthy hearings would help him arrive at one.

Q. Why did the Rules Comimttee report this resolution under a closed rule?

A. The Rules Committee examined all the precedents and apparently concluded that resolutions of this type have always come under a closed rule. This was the case with the Formosa Resolution, the Middle East Resolution, the Hungary Resolution, the Berlin Resolution, the Cuban Resolution, the Southeast Asia (Tonkin Gulf) Resolution, and the United Nations Resolution. Significantly, the four hours of general debate exceeds the length of general debate permitted in any of the foregoing cases.

Undoubtedly numerous members would like to change a word here or add a phrase there. To open it up for amendments would require at least a week of debate. It is believed important to make such a statement as this at the earliest practicable time, and scheduling of other legislation apparently did not permit allotting an entire week at this time. The rule requests four hours of general debate.

Q. Can passage of such a resolution be expected really to make a substantial contribution to the search for peace?

A. President Nixon thinks so. Ambassador Lodge thinks so. The Democratic and Republican leadership of the House think so. A substantial majority of the Foreign Affairs Committee members think so. Apparently 315 co-sponsors in the House think so. Particularly if we can pass it by an overwhelming majority, the resolution should make a realistic impact. It should help to induce genuine and fruitful negotiation. I earnestly pray that it will.

The answers circulated by Mr. WRIGHT raise some additional questions to which I would like to seek answers. First, Mr. WRIGHT states:

The resolution does make approving reference to "numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith." These obviously include the cessation of bombing ordered by President Johnson and the systematic troop reductions initiated by President Nixon.

In his November 3 statement, the President spoke of his "plan which will bring the war to an end regardless of what happens on the negotiating front." He said:

We have adopted a plan which we have worked out in cooperation with the South Vietnamese for the complete withdrawal of all United States combat ground forces and their replacement by South Vietnamese forces on an orderly scheduled timetable.

Clearly, then, the President does not limit the importance of his troop withdrawals—the "systematic troop reductions"—to diplomatic initiatives. Rather, his troop reductions are an initiative on "another front."

I am sure that the House does not mean to so limit to its diplomatic effect the significance of troop withdrawals. At some later date, if all hope for a negotiated settlement has been abandoned, this resolution must not be used as a justification to cancel troop withdrawal plans. The resolution could not properly be used to support such a proposition. Am I correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman predicates that upon an assumption that there might be at some time arise the moment when we would abandon the hope of negotiation?

Mr. FINDLEY. Exactly.

Mr. WRIGHT. At that point this resolution, it seems to me, would be utterly moot, because this resolution addresses itself to the hope that a just settlement may be negotiated and, indeed, is prompted by an earnest desire to assist in the negotiation of such a settlement which would embody the freedom of the people of that country.

Mr. FINDLEY. I am very gratified to have that clarification. I assume the same answer would apply to the following question: If it should occur that fair and free elections are out of the question and not in prospect at all—if we should reach that conclusion as a government—under such circumstances am I correct that this resolution could not be a proper point of reference to justify continued U.S. military measures in Vietnam?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not prepared to speculate on such a contingency. I am not prepared to acknowledge that we are going to reach any such point and say that free elections are impossible. This resolution addresses itself to the hope that there may be settled a just peace which will be fair to both sides and ascertained by free elections.

Mr. FINDLEY. We have to consider contingencies. Who would have dreamed in 1964, at the time of the Tonkin resolution, that events would come to pass putting hundreds of thousands of our men under arms in Vietnam? When the gentleman's splendid resolution was telephoned to Paris, our then Chief Negotiator, Ambassador Lodge, must have been in the process of packing his suitcase, because he was soon to announce his intention to resign in despair, and I think we must face the possibility that fair and free elections may not be in the picture in the foreseeable future.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will yield further, I must say I consider this question of the gentleman in the nature of a question asked by a prospective bride before repeating "I do," when she might ask the minister, "Now, is there anything in this ceremony which would permit my husband to mistreat me if later we were to get divorced?"

The question would not be timely at that moment. It has nothing to do with the ceremony.

I believe the gentleman's question is not really timely in connection with this. Of course this resolution says nothing with respect to what might happen if its announced goals and ardent hopes were rendered impossible of achievement. I believe and earnestly hope that those goals are capable of fulfillment. That is the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY. I hope none of us has to hold his breath until the time occurs when fair and free elections are next held throughout South Vietnam.

I thank the gentleman.

VIETNAM ROLL OF HONOR

Mr. Chairman, at intervals this year beginning on March 25, I have placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the names of American military personnel killed by hostile action in Vietnam. The second list was printed on April 3 and the most recent one was printed July 22.

The 2,999 names I am listing today cover the period from June through September 1969, as compiled by the Directorate of Statistical Services, Department of Defense.

The first listing, which required 122 pages of the RECORD, and consisted of 31,379 names, was of those killed prior to President Nixon's inauguration.

The subsequent listings, including the one today, consist of 8,013 names bringing the total to 39,392. Those killed since October 1, including 130 killed last week, are not listed.

Taken together they represent the Vietnam Roll of Honor. The list speaks eloquently in measuring the sacrifice the war has required of our young men.

That measurement has special importance today.

First, because this is the season when we give thanks for our blessings as a nation and rejoice in our Judeo-Christian heritage. It is a time for deep reflection, penitence and resolve—especially crucial this year because of our common determination to keep the Vietnam Roll of Honor from growing one name longer than necessary.

Second, because this is a moment when the decency America has always sought to exalt is clouded by the charge of U.S. massacre of Vietnamese civilians. As never before we need to comprehend the totality of what has developed in Vietnam and the circumstances which may have led some of our soldiers to acts of unspeakable barbarism. The lengthening list of Americans who have suffered violent death there suggests, at least, the bloodshed, agony and, no doubt, brutality that our men have experienced. Last week, for example, 130 Americans died in Vietnam from hostile actions—more than the total allegedly massacred. Is a person less innocent because he wears a uniform? This is a question we may consider as we ponder the innocence of war victims and the total agony of the conflict.

Third, because this is a day when the House of Representatives—for the first time since 1964—makes an official expression about Vietnam war policy.

It is, therefore, a day of grave responsibility for each of us in this Chamber. In my view, nothing can so well convey its gravity as the list of war dead, classified as it is by States and hometowns. Each name must weigh heavily upon us, because of the war decision responsibility which the Constitution places exclusively upon the Congress.

Through protracted neglect of this responsibility, we permitted a small involvement to grow into a major war. Now our President has not only halted the growth but turned it around. He has begun the withdrawal of our ground combat forces and announced a plan for the complete withdrawal of the remaining such forces.

At this juncture the House of Representatives should speak clearly in support of this plan. Official silence on the plan to end our combat involvement is neglect of the same grave order and magnitude as our silence when, step by step, the combat involvement was established.

Silence denies our President and our military forces, as well as the entire Nation, a measure of support which we alone can provide.

Today's RECORD will be filled with statements of support for the President's diplomatic efforts to end the war. This support is easy to extend. Few will hesitate to vote for peace with justice, the concept of free elections, the principle of self-determination, an appeal to Hanoi to let South Vietnam alone. To do so is natural, like saluting the flag.

Apparently, it is not so easy for the House of Representatives to come to grips with the fundamental decision to withdraw our remaining ground combat forces at the earliest practicable date. The President has made this decision, Secretary of State Rogers has said it is "irreversible," yet the House so far has refused to consider it.

It is not natural to grasp the nettle of basic decision if that chore can be left to others. The Congress shrank from the question of declaring war on Hanoi—we never faced up to it—and now we seem to shrink from the decision to terminate our ground combat involvement. It is more comfortable—easier—to relax in the relatively passive role of supply sergeant to our Nation's military needs and speak only to noncontroversial diplomatic initiatives, leaving the tough basic questions to be handled exclusively by the executive branch.

This is a time for testing of our constitutional system, testing the very mettle of representative government. This is a time for us to rise to a difficult occasion with a clear expression of support for President Nixon's plan for the complete withdrawal of our ground combat forces.

Yesterday the House rejected such an opportunity by refusing to open this resolution to amendment. Another opportunity comes on the motion to recommit. Perhaps other opportunities will follow when hearings on other Vietnam resolutions begin. I say the sooner the better.

By supporting the President's plan for troop withdrawal, we will act in the tradition of others who have served their country's interest with nobility and courage, especially those whose names are listed below:

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. REES).

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote "no" on House Resolution 613. I really do not see why we have to bring a resolution, with so many ramifications, to the floor under a closed rule.

In fact, sometimes I wonder why we even have a closed rule in the House of Representatives, as it certainly does limit debate and it certainly does prohibit amendments many Members wish to discuss as concerning the complicated negotiations in Paris.

There are two areas which worry me, which are not mentioned in the resolution.

One is the nature of the South Vietnamese Government. This is a military dictatorship. I believe it is a minority government that does not represent the people of South Vietnam. The election they had last year, I believe, was a fraud, because the most qualified candidates for president were not allowed to run, and many of the qualified politicians in South Vietnam are political prisoners.

There is nothing in this resolution about broadening the participation in the Government of South Vietnam. There is nothing in this resolution concerning democracy in a country where we say we are supposedly fighting for democracy.

There is something else that worries me, and that is the troop withdrawal. If we withdraw the troops, what are we going to find happening? If we withdraw, say, 200,000 troops and the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong seem to be on the edge of a military victory, are we going to send the troops back to bail out the South Vietnamese government or not? What is our policy in this area?

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. REES. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. Secretary Laird said in a hearing made available this morning that if the Vietnamization policy did not work, escalation of the war was a distinct possibility.

Mr. REES. This is the dilemma in which we find ourselves with this resolution. We find ourselves almost with a minor Gulf of Tonkin resolution giving our support to the administration's future policies in the peace negotiations in Paris.

Mr. HAYS. I have heard the gentleman talk about the Government of South Vietnam. If he would care to express his opinion of the Government of North Vietnam I would be glad to yield him another minute.

Mr. REES. I would be happy to.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. REES. I do not approve of the actions of the Government of North Vietnam. I do not approve of their tactics. I do not approve of the terrorism they have unleashed in the south.

But they are a major factor in these negotiations, they must be contended with at the Paris peace talks.

A very important factor is the Vietcong. How major a factor are they in the peace talks? Perhaps they are a more important factor than the Government of North Vietnam. Do we have a firm policy in negotiating with the National Liberation Front?

To negotiate, one does not have to love him, his adversary. But one has to recognize who he is and what his motives are.

Mr. HAYS. If the gentleman will look at the resolution, it says "free elections" for all the people of South Vietnam. That would include everybody, and those who call themselves the Vietcong and otherwise.

I just point out that the government of North Vietnam was never elected by anyone. The government of South Vietnam was elected by somebody. There is a difference.

Mr. REES. There is nothing in this resolution which refers to a meaningful coalition government of the various factions within South Vietnam. Unfortunately, we find most of the groups either in the prisons or without political rights.

I believe that whole concept of government in South Vietnam should be broadened along a complete political spectrum, if we are ever to deescalate the terror and to have a meaningful peace.

I will be one of those Members of Congress who will be issuing the following statement:

We do not endorse everything said by the President in his statement of November 3.

We specifically do not give advance approval of future decisions on Vietnam.

We affirmatively urge:

First, efforts to reduce the level of violence in Vietnam; second, the broadening of the political base of the Saigon government, and third, the immediate designation of a high-level replacement for retiring delegate Henry Cabot Lodge.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER).

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I, too, would like to address myself, as my distinguished colleague from Ohio has suggested to the government of North Vietnam. All of us who oppose this resolution are horrified at the gross immorality and inhumanity of the North Vietnamese Government. We are appalled at government by terror, blackmail, and assassination, yes, including the murder of innocent women and children. There is nothing good that we can say about the government of North Vietnam. The only significant thing we can say about them is that we are faced with a condition and not a theory. They are there, they exist, and if we are going to bring this war to an end, then the enemy, no matter how repugnant their conduct, must be talked to, and negotiated with. It is apparent that the government of South Vietnam is not willing to communicate with the north in a meaningful way and to extend their roots and broaden their base to include respected, moderate, non-Communist leaders like General Minh, with whom the North Vietnamese might be willing to enter into negotiations. Until the government of South Vietnam comes to the point of being willing to broaden its base and include within its ranks, spokesmen like big Minh who can communicate with the North Vietnamese, we will be involved indefinitely in this expensive and devastating war. And if we continue the process of Vietnamization by continuing the supply of air power, arms, and equipment to the South Vietnamese Government, we will find that the very size, scope, and scale of our intervention will continue to frustrate the very process of self determination which we are pledged to support, and, likewise, prevent the process of accommodation and coalition formation, which is an indispensible precondition to commencing meaningful talks with the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong.

I thank my colleague from Ohio for his courtesy in yielding this time to me.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN).

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I would join my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma who was in the well a few moments ago in praising the gentleman from Texas for his authorship of this resolution and commend both of these gentlemen for their distinguished work leading toward its passage.

When the President of the United States came to this House a few weeks ago to express his appreciation to that large number of Members of the House who had introduced such resolutions, he indicated that he was speaking to us as Americans and not as Democrats or Republicans, and he pointed out when it came to the important issues of foreign policy that we had always responded in Americans.

I am deeply appreciative of the majority of the Members on the Democratic side of this House as well as on the Republican side who have introduced these resolutions and who are standing up for their country in so doing. We are here acting as Americans and as representatives of the people. There has been a good deal of controversy as to who speaks for the people of the United States. We do. In the Federal Government, in the entire judicial branch, all are appointed. In the executive branch all are civil service or appointed people, except for the President and the Vice President, who are elected, although not directly by the people. It is only in the Congress at the Federal level that there is direct representation of the people, and this is most purely true in the House of Representatives. This is where the voice of the people is heard and their influence is directly felt at the Federal level of government. If we are going to have government of the people, by the people, and for the people, this must be the case. Therefore, the voice of the people of this country cannot be more clearly or purely heard than through the passage of a resolution such as this one which has been introduced by more than 300 Members of the House of Representatives. Through us, the silent majority has found its voice, and speaks out on this issue loud and clear in the passage of this resolution.

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Gladly.

Mr. WALDIE. Is it the gentleman's understanding that in the description used in the resolution, to negotiate a just peace, that a Communist government in South Vietnam which came into power by election would result in a just peace?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is my understanding that the policy of the President—and I will yield to the gentleman from Texas, as the author of the resolution—is to abide by the results of a full and free election, whatever those results may be. I think I must say to the gentleman that such an outcome as he describes is beyond the realm of possibility, in my considered judgment.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas for a more complete response.

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I refuse to yield further until I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT).

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Alabama for yielding. I do agree with the response given by the gentleman from Alabama. I do believe that the gentleman from Alabama has correctly interpreted the position of the President of the United States.

In response to the question propounded by the gentleman from California, based upon a hypothetical possibility that if free elections were held and most of the people of South Vietnam voted to embrace a Communist government, the question propounded was, would this constitute a just settlement or a just peace?

In my opinion, whatever responds fairly to the freely expressed will of the people of that or any other country is just. We are not in South Vietnam to impose upon those people a government of our choice. We are there to defend their right to a government of their choice.

Mr. WALDIE. Now, Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield further briefly?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, briefly.

Mr. WALDIE. I want to quote to the gentleman President Nixon's statement in 1960 during the Kennedy-Nixon debate:

> We cannot tolerate a Communist government in South Vietnam.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BUCHANAN. May I say in response that I am confident and I suspect Mr. Nixon is confident that there is no possibility of such a result from his present policy. I think it is an honest policy, a policy based upon reason and knowledgeability concerning this problem. A free election simply would not result in a Communist government in Vietnam.

There is apparently great misunderstanding in our country both of the strength and the virtue of the government now in power in South Vietnam. I think, perhaps, there are many who fail to understand the situation. The President's present policy of Vietnamization and of step-by-step withdrawal has an excellent chance of success. A basic reason is the growing strength and popularity of the government of the Republic of Vietnam.

Unlike any Communist government in the world today, the present government in Saigon is an expression of the self-determination of the people of that country and exists as the result of a free election. Within the past 2 years a constitution has been drafted for the Government of the Republic of Vietnam and ratified by a referendum of the people. It established a tripartite system with an elected executive branch, an elected legislative branch, and an independent judiciary. Elections were held which American observers on the scene at the time characterized as fair and free elections. A higher percentage of the people of the Republic of Vietnam participated in voting than is the case with our own elections in the United States.

It has been my privilege to meet many members of the legislative branch of that Government and a number in responsible positions in the executive branch. I am impressed with the high caliber of these officials and their determination to create a stable, viable, non-Communist government responsive to the needs of the people of that troubled land. It is not by any means a perfect government. Neither is our own. To dismiss this government, created and elected by the people of Vietnam, as just another dictatorship, however, is libelous in the extreme. It is something of a miracle that in a place wracked for a generation by war this infant Republic could even be born while the heat of the conflict continues. Yet this has not only happened, but the strength of that government continues to increase and its base of popular support continues to broaden.

The Tet offensive of 1968, so misunderstood in the United States, was a disaster for the Communists. It was an abortive effort to bring about the collapse of the Saigon government which resulted instead in the loss of much of the military leadership of the Vietcong, substantial loss of their political infrastructure, plus the bulk of Vietcong manpower. Most of the troops against which we now fight are North Vietnamese regulars. The rate of defections to the Republic of Vietnam has dramatically increased. In the pacification program the Vietcong infrastructure has been continuingly ferreted out, while on the positive side the government, assisted by our Agency for International Development and the civic action programs of our military, has continued to build a better society for the people of Vietnam in the midst of war and has received increasing support from the population at the grassroots level.

Militarily, the Republic of Vietnam's forces have also grown stronger and with the present intensified training program and the continued supply of adequate weaponry, should be able on a step-by-step basis to take over the combat assignments successfully.

The President's policy of Vietnamization of the conflict can succeed with or without progress at the negotiating table in Paris. It is indeed possible that the resolution which we are about to pass will not result in any visible improvement in these negotiations. In my judgment, the North Vietnamese, who have never admitted their leadership of the Vietcong and other Communist forces in South Vietnam and who have tended to deny the very presence of North Vietnamese regular forces there, may well never make open concessions at the conference table. It would seem to me more likely that when the decision is made to withdraw from South Vietnam, they will simply do so without ever making any admissions or public concessions.

This resolution does, even so, serve a very important purpose in that it makes clear to the Communists and to the world that the American people do stand behind their President in his effort toward a just peace in Vietnam and in his determination that the people of that troubled land shall be guaranteed the right of self-determination. This would logically strengthen the hand of our negotiators in Paris, but whether or not this is the case, it will certainly be of benefit to our troops in Vietnam. This clear expression of our Nation's resolve and commitment cannot but be of benefit to the people of South Vietnam in their struggle for freedom against a Communist aggression which would impose upon them by force a totalitarian government.

It is my profound hope that this message from the people of the United States will be factually reported by the news media here and elsewhere and clearly understood by the Communists. If this is the case, it will in fact serve to shorten the conflict and help to bring a real and lasting peace in Southeast Asia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF.)

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, debate on this resolution has brought forth many definitions of the crucial phrase "just peace," so once again I must wonder what, really, is a just peace?

Have not all the answers given only proved the abiguity of this phrase?

After all, did not President Johnson seek a just peace when he escalated the conflict?

In fact, whenever our country has gone to war has not a just peace been our goal?

Are we going to use our definition of this ambiguous phrase? Or Saigon's? Or Hanoi's?

To put all this in perspective, is not this one of the most important—perhaps the most important—issue to come before the House this year?

Then, why were no hearings held on this measure?

Why was it closed to amendments in committee and on the floor?

What are the supporters of this resolution afraid of?

Why, on the paramount issue of Vietnam, are we again going to write a blank check that holds the potential of bankrupting this country?

Are not the answers given to this pivotal question really specious?

Why is the House again ready to abdicate its proper role in the determination of policy?

When will we stop being a rubberstamp for the executive branch?

Could not we just as well fold up and go home if all we are going to do is give blanket, blind support to the President?

Is not this resolution, like the ill-fated Tonkin Gulf resolution, open to whatever intepretation the President may choose to give it?

Did the authors and all who signed this resolution really mean to give a blanket endorsement?

Is it not understood that a vote against this resolution is not a vote against the President or national unity, but a vote against a poorly worded, ambiguous resolution? The fact that the President views the resolution as support for his November 3 speech, even though it was written before then, raises the question—Are not the sponsors' motives already being distorted?

When the President came here, he still did not answer the question: "What is his policy?"

Why do we support an ephemeral policy that has never been explained to us?

Is that policy reflected in the following headline from today's Washington Post?: "Laird Sees Escalation Possible if Nixon Plan Fails To Win War."

But then has not the President said we do not seek a military victory?

What about those of you who want to win in Vietnam—Does an aye vote bind you to a no-win policy? An ultimate communist takeover.

Will not this resolution undermine and make a sham of the Paris negotiations?

How long can we tolerate this ambiguity?

And does not this resolution really compound that ambiguity?

Can not this resolution really pave the way for escalation, surrender or anything in between?

Are the sponsors prepared to accept any of these alternatives?

In another direction, Mr. Chairman, what does Vietnamization mean?

How long do we stay in Vietnam during Vietnamization? 10 years? 50 years? indefinitely?

To those who claim foreign aid is a giveaway, How long do we continue this biggest giveaway?

How long will we let Vietnam play havoc with our economy?

How do we justify to the American people—to our constituents—the higher taxes, prohibitive interest rates and inflation that Vietnam has caused?

How do we resolve the Vietnamization of the war with our goal of peace?

Is it war or peace that we want?

Or are we committed to the endless financing of corruption? Handouts? Giveaways?

This is supposed to be a resolution to help achieve the worthy goal of "bringing us together"—is not it?

But would not it aggravate the divisiveness rather than helping to ease the great stress and tension in this country? Would not passage of the resolution unleash new waves of discontent among Americans of varying views?

For I ask those who have supported the war, Do you realize this resolution opens the door for participation in the electoral process of the very Vietcong we have been fighting?

Is this the reason we have given 45,000 American lives and more than $100 billion?

Will you who have supported the war be satisfied with the Communist takeover that this resolution is ready to accept?

Will those who have been able to justify our policy in Vietnam, be able to justify to their constituents a Communist government in Saigon?

President Nixon says he has adopted a new policy in Vietnam, so to those who supported President Johnson and now President Nixon I ask: Which policy do you really favor?

And to those sponsoring this resolution who have otherwise questioned policy, are you ready to repeat the error of Tonkin Gulf and possibly prolong the war?

Why did not the author of this resolution offer a similar resolution when President Johnson desired national unity?

These, Mr. Chairman, are the questions that have not been answered. How can we possibly vote "aye" when instead of unity this resolution only brings about confusion?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. SISK).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SISK was granted permission to speak out of order.)

FOR A FAIRER FLYING FINGER

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, I understand, although I did not have the pleasure of observing it, that I made national television last night, not necessarily in a commendable fashion, but as a result of what has been reported to me I have sent the following telegram today, dispatched to Rowing and Martian, National Boobcasting Co., Beautiful Downtown Burbank, Calif.:

Laugh-In's decision to give me Flying Finger Award is consistent with standards of performance vigorously defended in recent weeks by executives of major networks and NBC. For prodigious feat of getting my name correct and everything else wrong you are hereby awarded the Spiro T. Agnew Flying Greek citation for outstanding achievement in electronic journalism. Honorable mention certificates go to print media for publishing erroneous information originally and to your research staff (laughter) for not troubling to verify accuracy of published reports. This exceptional accomplishment in broadcast reportage should be of assistance to television industry in fending off charges of irresponsibility and lack of objectivity. At the very least it will be of material help to our congressional reorganization subcommittee, which is currently deliberating whether to open House of Representatives to television coverage. For the record I am not now and never have been a member of any congressional committee or subcommittee contemplating a trip to Africa to inspect roads or for any other purpose.

Since you are now properly informed, and with an affectionate genuflection toward the Federal Communications Commission and its fairness doctrine, I trust your fierce determination to speak the truth will lead you to take time at the earliest possible moment on a network laugh-in broadcast to make an appropriate correction. Unfortunately, in my humble judgment, a press release acknowledging the error will not do. Yours for a fairer flying finger.

B. F. SISK.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that if this does not produce the proper results I am going to contact Vice President AGNEW and solicit his assistance in this matter.

Back on the subject of the resolution at hand—and seriously, Mr. Chairman—I do support House Resolution 613. I signed this resolution as a cosponsor of the original resolution 612, because I do pledge my full support to the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

Since we can have only one President at a time, I have confidence that this President vigorously, sincerely, and with dedication seeks a just peace in Vietnam, just as the previous Presidents have sought it, and I support him in it. I see no earthly reason why anyone today would have any hesitation in supporting the President of the United States, the present one, the past ones, or one in the future, in seeking peace in any area of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. FOUNTAIN).

Mr. FOUNTAIN. Mr. Chairman, as one of the original cosponsors of House Resolution 613 I rise to support it.

I think it might be appropriate to report at this point at least one passage from the President's own remarks—a passage that should be read again and again by the war's more intelligent and responsible critics:

A nation cannot remain great if it betrays its Allies and lets down its friends. Our defeat and humiliation in South Vietnam without question would promote recklessness in the councils of those great powers who have not yet abandoned their goals of world conquest. This would spark violence wherever our commitments help maintain the peace—in the Middle East, in Berlin, eventually even in the Western Hemisphere. Ultimately this would cost more lives. It would not bring peace. It would bring more war.

This, I am convinced, is the central issue of Vietnam. It is the major reason for our being there. It is the reason we can only get out in an honorable and responsible manner. It is why cries for unilateral, unconditional, total, and immediate American withdrawal are incompatible with this Nation's spirit and ideals—and why such a withdrawal would collapse the confidence which countless millions all over the world have in this country, and thus precipitate eventual disaster for the cause of freedom everywhere.

Mr. Chairman, surely we all want peace with justice in Vietnam. An overwhelming majority of Americans would like to see an early end to the war. In a world torn by violence, every human heart longs for peace.

However, it is apparent, especially after the recent demonstrations in Washington, that there is a sharp division of opinion about how to achieve the desired peace.

I fear there is a serious misunderstanding abroad, and particularly in North Vietnam, Russia and Communist China, as to the degree of support which exists for the President's attempts to end the war with justice and honor through negotiations.

The Communist representatives in Paris have repeatedly thrown up to our negotiators the fact of individual and group dissent within the United States.

Let me make it clear that I strongly support the right of responsible dissent. I also support just as strongly the right to dissent from dissent. Regrettably the Communists do not understand that this is democracy in action under our system.

However, the impression being spread abroad in the world, stemming from selected quotes by prominent Americans, including Members of Congress, is that America is almost wholly unwilling to do anything but precipitately withdraw from South Vietnam, that America is on the verge of internal political collapse.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Americans are still willing to pay any price to further the cause of freedom in the world. The President does have the substantial backing of the American people and of Members of the Congress. In fact, one of the latest polls indicates that 73 percent of our people are behind him.

This resolution would effectively rebut such allegations and show that an overwhelming majority of the American people want a just and responsible peace in Vietnam through negotiations, if humanly possible.

To demonstrate that support in a meaningful way, this resolution, if passed, will affirm the support of the House of Representatives for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just and honorable peace in Vietnam.

Whether right or wrong, the United States has declared it is not seeking a military victory in Vietnam. That is now the declared policy of the United States. It was the policy of the previous administration.

I personally think we were wrong in saying this and in not seeking a military victory which I believe we could have already won by now, especially if we had not halted the bombing and if we had put the proper military pressure upon North Vietnam. But our Government chose rather to fight a defensive war—to fight back, so to speak, in response to attacks from the enemy, and even then our troops were seriously restricted as to what they could do.

Unless we are willing, therefore, to endorse and accept a military and diplomatic defeat—which I am not—either announced or tacitly implied in any hasty withdrawal—then the only remaining alternative is a responsible and honorable withdrawal. This means, of course, protecting our own men and enabling those who have relied on us, to protect themselves after we leave.

That is the course the President outlined to the Nation on November 3. I believe he is earnestly trying to end the war and achieve an honorable peace. He needs our unlimited support in this effort. In fact, he must have it if even a semblance of stability and peace in Asia is to be achieved.

But, in order for a negotiated peace to be achieved, there must be some give and take on both sides. If the U.S. position is misunderstood in the world, then the other side will never participate in meaningful negotiations. They have already demonstrated this fact time and time again.

I believe this House resolution, cosponsored by over 300 other Members will help in this regard. At least, it will help set the record straight.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BURKE).

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the House Resolution 613 supporting the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

Why? Because I believe that the President, since assuming office on January 20, has pointed the direction for the American people, the way to a peace with honor that hopefully would discourage the Communists from starting other wars of aggression.

If we will now support the President in his efforts to achieve such a peace, this will be at least one kind of victory and perhaps this is the best we can hope for at this point in time.

Certainly no one can deny that it will be a victory if, when we leave South Vietnam as the President plans, we leave it fully able to defend itself if it has the will to do so.

We will not have run out on our allies as some have proposed, and we will not, as a country, have run out on our honor.

Instead, we will have taken a major step in implementing the President's plan for the security of all of Southeast Asia.

The plan that says: The United States will keep all of her treaty commitments.

That we shall provide a shield if a nuclear power threatens the freedom of a nation allied with us, or of a nation whose survival we consider vital to our security.

That in cases involving other types of aggression, we shall furnish military and economic assistance when requested, in accordance with our treaty commitments. But we shall look to the nation directly threatened to assume the primary responsibility of providing the manpower for its defense.

Mr. Chairman, it is clear to me that our support of this resolution will help the President to follow this plan in Vietnam and to achieve a just and a fair peace.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PUCINSKI).

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this resolution which in my judgment would help the President get us out of Vietnam.

Mr. Chairman, I support this resolution without reservation. I am not going to try to read anything into it or to read anything out of it. It simply states that the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. That is exactly what we are doing here.

We can talk all around this resolution. The fact remains that when you reduce this debate to its lowest common denominator you come up with only one answer: There is only one man in this country who has the awesome responsibility of bringing peace and that man is the Commander in Chief, under our Constitution, the President of the United States.

I want to affirm my support of the Commander in Chief. The President has spoken forcefully and clearly about his plans to withdraw American troops from Vietnam. I think some of his critics have failed to read his message on November 3. The President has made a commitment—a national commitment—to troop withdrawal. He has a plan for such withdrawal and I think he is wise in not announcing a specific timetable for the removal of these troops from Vietnam.

But certainly the situation is such today that such a troop withdrawal is possible.

President Johnson has said right along that if we can endure—if we can just hold the line, the time will come when the tide will shift in Vietnam and we can start withdrawing our troops. That time has now come.

When we went into South Vietnam there was no government; there was no economy; and South Vietnam had no army. They were on the brink of total collapse to the Communists. They were on the very brink of being completely taken over by the Communists.

Today, whether you like this government or not, there is a stable government. It is a government that has endured longer than any other government in the last 20 years. It is a de facto government in that country. There is a strong healthy economy in South Vietnam.

Just the other day they dedicated a new steel mill outside of Saigon which will produce 20 percent of the steel needs of all of Southeast Asia.

There is an army of a million South Vietnamese in South Vietnam—well trained. I saw those soldiers. I saw them in action.

So the President has properly stated that we can now assume a new posture—a new policy in Vietnam, of a gradual and orderly withdrawal of troops. For South Vietnam is now for the first time ready to assume the major role in its own defense.

I do not pretend to speak for the President or for the administration, but I have every reason to believe that by the end of 1970 there will be less than 200,000 American troops left in Vietnam and these will be mostly service-support troops.

President Nixon has set down a policy of disengagement of combat troops. And even if the war should turn and if there should be a new escalation of the war by the enemy, the President now has many options. He does not have to return American troops to Vietnam nor does he have to limit our help to South Vietnam only to renewed use of American troops.

So what we are saying here today in effect is that the situation has changed. The President has developed a series of new options and is using those options. He has committed this country to troop withdrawal. It would be my hope that we would look at this situation. In the long, hard, costly, difficult war, one that has cost us 40,000 American lives, 300,000 casualties, and countless billions of dollars, there is for the first time hope for American disengagement, and I would hope that this Congress, with the support of Members on both sides of the aisle, will get behind this President. He is our President—not as a Democrat or a Republican. He is our constitutional Commander in Chief. Let us serve notice on Vietnam that under his leadership, we will work our way out of this thing and have the just and honorable peace that this resolution calls for.

Mr. Chairman, I hope we can all see our way clear to join in unanimous support of this very important tool the President needs so urgently at this critical time to bring this tragic conflict to an end, or at least our own involvement in this conflict to an end.

I urge the unanimous support of President Nixon's plan for peace in Vietnam by voting for this resolution.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MCCLORY).

Mr. MCCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I am proud to express my support today of House Resolution 613 indicating approval by the Members of this body of the President's efforts to bring an early and honorable peace in Vietnam.

It is intended as no reflection on the aims and objectives of the previous administrations to note here unqualifiedly that the President has taken new initiatives and, indeed, has articulated a new Asian policy which is being carried out in Vietnam and elsewhere in the Far East.

This policy which contemplates a reduction in American manpower—yes, and the complete withdrawal of American combat ground forces from Vietnam at the earliest practicable date—gives assurances also that our long held objectives for the people of South Vietnam continue to be in support of self-determination through operation of democratic processes—free elections supervised by an impartial international body.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the President's determination to delegate primary responsibility for conducting the Vietnam war to the Vietnamese themselves, and to limit our role to that of a supplier of military and economic assistance and the assigning of military advisers—this, in my opinion, should always have been our role and this should again be our role. Indeed, this appears to me to be a position consistent with a long-range policy which was developed following World War II. The President's statement in Guam and elsewhere make clear his determination that we should return to that policy.

In addition to the overwhelming support which the President's policy appears to have among the American people, I was impressed during recent brief visits to India, Thailand, South Korea, and Japan, to note the substantial support of the political leaders of those countries in behalf of the Nixon doctrine.

I was particularly impressed in a conversation with the top career officer in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for India when he expressed concern for the plight of India in the event of a precipitate withdrawal of American forces from Vietnam, While the Indians have been critical of our presence in Vietnam, they are aware also, as the result of being attacked by the Red Chinese, that any thoughtless and precipitate conduct on our part would endanger their own welfare. The leaders of Thailand, South Korea and Japan, with whom I spoke, praised both the determination of the President to scale down our involvement in the Far East as well as his declaration that the Asian nations themselves must assume the major responsibility for their own defense. It is heartening to know of this support since these nations of the Far East face the Red Chinese literally at gunpoint.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution, House Resolution 613 recognizes the appropriate role of the President in the conduct of the foreign affairs of our Government and particularly in connection with the war in Vietnam. It supports the President's policy for peace and is an honorable and meaningful expression of this body in behalf of the American people whom we represent.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. BURTON).

Mr. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, time and procedural limitations make it difficult for the individual Members to express precisely our respective positions on this important question. My own opposition to the war I must assume is well known.

Just as the Tonkin Bay resolution has been interpreted as a blank check to conduct a war, so this resolution lends itself to the interpretation of providing carte blanche approval—before the fact—as to future negotiations.

The primary thrust of the resolution, in my view, whether intended or not, is to inhibit dissent. This thrust, in my view, will prove to be of little or no avail.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, among others, I intend to oppose the pending matter.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of California. I yield to my distinguished colleague from New York (Mr. OTTINGER).

Mr. OTTINGER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee or the author of the resolution, if as they contend the resolution encompasses no authorization for increased military activity, why, then, did the committee reject amendments that would have made that clear?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. The answer to that is that this resolution addresses itself to the subject of our negotiating posture, not our military posture.

I should like to make one comment, if I may——

Mr. BURTON of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York for another question.

Mr. OTTINGER. The fear of many of us is that, as previous resolutions and previous statements in behalf of peace have been interpreted to support increased military activity in the name of peace, this resolution may well be construed by the President and used by him, as congressional support for military escalation in the name of promoting a just peace in the future. Certainly, if he decides to escalate he will use this as justification, despite the ambiguous protestation of the sponsors.

Mr. BURTON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. The purpose of the resolution, contrary to the earlier comment, is not to inhibit dissent. The purpose is to affirm assent. We affirm our assent for the efforts of the President to negotiate a just peace.

Any Member of the House might speculate ad infinitum as to some conceivable decision the President might in the future make. This does not address itself to that. This addresses itself to the announced goal of the President to negotiate a peace based on free elections.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield my self 1 minute to answer to the gentleman's question.

I suppose the fair answer to it is that it was because nobody offered such an amendment, so therefore it was not put in the bill.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. The minority views say there were two amendments offered. One was to make it clear that this resolution did not mean approval of any enlargement or escalation of involvement in Vietnam, and the other was to make it clear the resolution did not afford an independent authorization for the commitment or maintenance of troops in Vietnam.

I read from page 16 of the minority views. It says both amendments were offered in the committee and rejected.

Mr. HAYS. I will say to the gentleman, on reading the minutes, there was such an amendment offered. I did not remember it. I thought the gentleman was talking about the resolution to continue troop withdrawal, which was turned down.

The reason I voted against it, and I do not mind telling the gentleman, was to prevent the very things which are being said today, as to giving carte blanche authority to the President to move troops around.

I have said over and over again I do not want to tie the President's hands as to meaningful negotiations. But I have said over and over again this resolution is expressing support for him to negotiate peace—not to make war, not to escalate, not to move in more troops.

I do not know how much more clear we can make it.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. COLLIER).

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is a Member of this body who is not fully aware of the fact that the North Vietnamese negotiators in Paris have used street protests and pronouncements of certain elected public officials against U.S. policy as an effective propaganda tool. I happen to believe that it has been a deterrent to any progress or success in the peace talks up to this time. However, because we enjoy, thank God, the right of free people in a democracy, no one should question the right of orderly or peaceful dissent. Regrettably, though, the dissent of a vocal minority of Americans both in and out of public office has been incorrectly assessed by our adversary. The idea that the expressed attitude of the most vocal and ardent dissenters reflects a consensus of the sentiment of the people of this country both in and out of Congress is lamentable. If we were able to get every adult citizen of this country into this Chamber and read to them the clear and concise language of House Resolution 613 and if it were further possible to have them vote for or against the resolution, can there be any doubt in anyone's mind in this Chamber as to what the outcome would be? I do not think so.

I, like many other Members of this body and many people throughout the country, have had frustrations about the war in Vietnam. I, like many of you, hope and pray for the day when we can extricate ourselves from the quagmire in which we find ourselves in Southeast Asia. Why and how we got there is at this juncture of no consequence in the discussion of this resolution. Certainly these frustrations do not justify the reading into it all of the things that are just not there or setting up of straw men, if you please, based upon what is not in the language. What can possibly be contrary to the hopes and desires of every citizen in this resolution to seek a just peace and to give the people of South Vietnam the right to choose its leaders, to determine its own fate by its own choice.

I have heard so often Members of this body espouse their deep belief in the right of every man everywhere in the world to human dignity. Essential to human dignity is the right of the people to free elections rather than to be placed under the heel of a totalitarian system. Our belief in this principle twice saved the world from disaster since the turn of this century. This principle has shaped the course of this Nation. Can we ask anything less than that for others anywhere in the world? We are today merely reaffirming our belief in this principle and supporting at the same time an effort to achieve peace on this basis. If we pass this resolution by an overwhelming vote today, it seems to me we will be announcing to the world and to the peace conferees in Paris that we still believe in these ideals. I hope that this House does just that before this day is over.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I am delighted to yield to my colleague.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Our colleague from New York (Mr. OTTINGER) asked a question as to why this resolution does not carry a proviso in it that the President cannot increase our troop strength in Vietnam. Would my colleague from Illinois agree with me that if such a proviso were included in the resolution, it would have the same adverse effect that the President's announcement of a timetable would? The President quite wisely said, "I have a timetable, but I will not announce it and tell the enemy how long they will have to wait." Would this not have the same effect if we were to say in here that the President cannot increase troop strength?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois 1 additional minute.

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I thank the gentleman.

We would in effect be saying in this resolution that this House is saying to the President that he cannot use whatever resources are available to bring this conflict to a just peace.

Mr. COLLIER. Yes; I agree with the gentleman. There is certainly no intent—and the gentleman should understand this from the nature of the resolution—that we are not trying to write tactical military policy during the consideration of this resolution.

And, Mr. Chairman, I must go to this point: When you attempt to spell out to the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, the President of the United States, a blueprint by which the Members of this House think he ought to follow with reference to both policy and the conduct of the war, in my opinion that would be ridiculous. We have never done it before and God forbid we never do it.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. I do not support the Goodell resolution for a fixed timetable, nor was that the intent of the question. The question was whether this resolution authorizes the President to increase our military activity in South Vietnam—whether we are giving advance blanket approval, abdicating our future congressional prerogatives, to whatever military action the President may decide is needed to produce his definition of a just peace. The amendments rejected in committee would not have tied the President's hands, as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, but would have merely made it clear—as the resolution sponsors now assert—that the resolution does not involve approval of any enlargement or escalation of military activities in Vietnam and does not give any authorization for the commitment or maintenance of troops in Vietnam. The rejection of these amendments—and the closed rule prohibiting such amendments from being considered on the floor—leave the resolution open to interpretation that it is a blank check to the President to take any military action he deems appropriate in pursuit of a just peace, as he sees it. The chairman of the subcommittee admitted the rejection of these amendments. In the face of this admission, it is hard to believe later statements that the resolution encompasses the rejected amendments anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER).

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, 11 months after the fateful loss of President Kennedy this House passed a resolution known as the Gulf of Tonkin resolution giving certain authority to the President of the United States with respect to Southeastern Asia. Perhaps it is more than a coincidence that 11 months after President Nixon takes office we are now considering a resolution to express to the President our support for his efforts to achieve a just peace in Vietnam.

I would judge that once this resolution is passed, just as after the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, it will probably be another 5 years before this House acts again.

Mr. Chairman, the problem with this resolution is, as the gentleman from Oklahoma so candidly stated, that it simply reiterates the goals that President Johnson stated again and again, which was that all the United States wanted was for the people of South Vietnam to have the freedom to choose their own future. In the name of that objective we first had some 20,000 troops and then several hundred thousand troops and then over one-half million troops in South Vietnam. I wish that in South Vietnam we could have elections for the people of that beleaguered country. But when the question was put even to those who are advocating the resolution, "Do you really want a Communist government in South Vietnam, assuming the people voted for it?" the answer was that it really is not going to happen; it is very unlikely. But, if it happens, that is all right.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Do you want a Communist government in South Vietnam?

Mr. FRASER. No.

Mr. HAYS. All right.

Mr. FRASER. In other words, what the proponents of the resolution are telling this House is that they want a settlement of this war under a procedure which they, themselves, claim would mean that the Communists would gain no political power.

Now the Communists today and the North Vietnamese forces control certain territory and a certain part of the population of South Vietnam. But the sponsors are, in effect, urging that we hold out for a solution to the conflict in Vietnam, which by their own statement would put the Liberation Front and the North Vietnamese forces further behind than they are today. Do you settle a war using diplomacy or procedures of elections which are going to basically change the relative status of the parties held by them while they are in conflict? I think that any student of international affairs would have to acknowledge that you cannot reasonably expect to settle a war in terms that are substantially different than those reflected in the actual conditions on the battlefield.

What does this mean? It means if we persist in the same goals that President Johnson persisted in for 4 long years, since early 1965, we will fight on and on and on.

And we are going to be fighting harder, I regret to say, than the South Vietnamese themselves are fighting. This is one of the tragedies of that war. If there is any one lesson one can draw from South Vietnam, and I think you can draw many, it is that you do not go in to help people when your forces are going to have to fight harder than the forces of the people you are trying to help.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Minnesota suggest that we should abandon and forsake the idea of a government in South Vietnam based upon the will of the people as ascertained in an election, a free election in which all the people will be privileged to vote?

Mr. FRASER. I know the gentleman asks the question in all seriousness, and in all seriousness I simply have to tell the gentleman that the choice which faces the United States is either to change our objective or to fight on indefinitely.

Let me ask the gentleman a question: Is the gentleman prepared to stay on in South Vietnam indefinitely in order to pursue this objective? Is the gentleman prepared to say that we should stay for another 10 or 20 years in order to see the objective sought come into being?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would answer the gentleman by saying that I do not think it would be necessary to stay there indefinitely.

Mr. FRASER. It may not be necessary to stay there indefinitely, but if it were would you be willing to stay there?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would not be here with this resolution if that were the only alternative. I believe a peaceful settlement can be made.

I apologize to the gentleman for taking up too much of his time, but does the gentleman from Minnesota believe that we ought to engage in forcing on the South Vietnamese a coalition government from the outside that would not necessarily be ratified by the will of the people?

Mr. FRASER. My own thought is this: that the United States should not seek to impose on the Saigon government anything. It is my view that the United States has done enough. It has done too much. We should proceed to disengage from the war and let the Vietnamese settle the conflict themselves.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FRASER. I yield further to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the gentleman think that is a satisfactory settlement if a way can be seen that will end the conflict?

Mr. FRASER. I think this war is an unmitigated tragedy. It is as bad a tragedy as I know of anywhere in the world. It is the kind of tragedy that we saw in the civil war in China. It is the kind of tragedy that is found in the Nigeria disaster, by what has occurred in Greece. It is the kind of tragedy that is as bad as any that we have seen around the world. I can only say to the gentleman that there are some problems we cannot solve by ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STEIGER).

Mr. STEIGER of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I think as everybody else must have observed from listening to the arguments this afternoon, that we have seen a rather interesting development. We have seen what appears to me to be politicians who have painted themselves into a corner by previous rhetoric who are really afraid to vote for this, politicians who are willing to lend themselves to an interpretation that is as farfetched as an interpretation can be. They have tried to make appear ambiguous that which is relatively free from ambiguity. They say that those who support this particular document are enforcing or endorsing a Communist government in South Vietnam, and they have tried to tell that it is asking for a decrease in the rate of withdrawal of troops.

Mr. Chairman, I think they are embarrassed bceause they are in a position of having to vote against a just peace in Vietnam, and against free elections in Vietnam.

It would seem to me that if they do feel that they are unable to vote for that, then their embarrassment is genuine, and I share it with them.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the author of the resolution, and the committee for bringing it out.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY).

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. Chairman, peace in Vietnam is one of the most urgent tasks facing our Nation, and I support President Nixon in his efforts to achieve that peace. This does not mean, however, that I feel this House should serve as a "rubberstamp" for Presidential policies in the field of foreign affairs. The people of our district did not elect us to sit up here on the Hill flashing green lights to the Executive down the Avenue. It represents no lack of confidence in the President to urge that a resolution of such import as House Resolution 613 be given our most careful study and consideration. We would be defaulting our constitutional obligations if we did otherwise. It is the purpose of our system of checks and balances to bring a balanced judgment to the issues we face. Vietnam, the subject of the resolution before us today, is the most burning issue of our times.

The initiative in the field of foreign relations is with the President, but the Constitution provides for the participation of Congress in foreign affairs both directly and indirectly. It is the responsibility of the Congress to determine national spending priorities, to raise armies, and to initiate revenue measures which support armies. Most importantly the Constitution grants to the Congress the power to declare war.

The Congress can perform a valuable function by assuming responsibility for the careful scrutiny and critical discussion of foreign policies and programs. In this way it can contribute to the clarification of basic policy issues, and help keep the executive agencies more alert, more efficient, and sharper in their own intellectual processes. Legislative hearings and debate on major foreign policy issues can contribute to public understanding and discussion of the issues.

The danger of security leaks during such public hearings and debate can be minimized, and the risk of such leaks is outweighed by the advantages of enlightened debate on the facts. The people should have a proper channel for a critical analysis and evaluation of foreign policy decisions, and, through their representatives in Congress, they should share with the President in framing broad national objectives in the field of foreign affairs.

Let us play our constitutional role in contributing toward the formulation of foreign policy. I urge the Members of this House to defeat the resolution before us today and send the measure back to the Foreign Affairs Committee for hearings where we can have the opportunity to question officials and experts regarding the implications of this resolution and the many other resolutions on this subject. We are supposed to be a deliberative body. Let us deliberate and study and question before voting on such an important matter.

Mr. Chairman, I have observed the debate for 2 days now and I have been here most of the time.

Many issues have been raised. I think the most important and overriding one is that there are many disputes on the factual basis upon which this resolution is based and that these disputes could be resolved if proper hearings were held before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN).

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this resolution should have clarified a number of issues for many of us.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the resolution. It is my hope, which I believe most of us share, that this resolution in a modest way can be helpful in bringing the war in Vietnam to an early and honorable settlement.

I believe this is a modest contribution. And I pay tribute to the author of the resolution because it does not attempt to take a position on, or to resolve some of the knotty questions with respect to Vietnam. Its basic purpose is simply to support the President in his efforts, which are still continuing, to begin successful negotiations in Vietnam. It takes nothing away from the President in the exercise of his prerogatives and it gives nothing to him. But a public statement of support for his efforts.

The language, of course, could be different. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I pointed out in committee that there were certain changes I might consider advisable. There were major changes offered in the form of amendments in the committee; all these were defeated, in some cases by relatively small margins.

I personally felt that it would not have been inappropriate for our committee to have modified this resolution so as to include some reference to troop withdrawals, those which have taken place or which may take place in the future. At the same time I voted against an open rule on this resolution because without some restriction on debate in the House we could, in an attempt to write legislation in this area, perhaps take until Christmas. I doubt if much would be gained if the House should have been given that opportunity.

However, I personally hope that our Committee on Foreign Affairs does hold hearings on other resolutions in this general area, both with respect to troop withdrawals and other subjects. This will allow both Members of the Congress and members of the executive branch to come and discuss these questions.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I am glad the gentleman made the point about voting for the motion to order the previous question. So did I. It seems to me that those who now raise that point most loudly were the first ones to call for bringing the student loan program before the House under suspension so no amendments could be offered, and similarly on the tax bill they voted to bring it before the House under a closed rule. This is not the first time that an important measure has come before the House under this procedure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

One of the advantages of this resolution, in my opinion, is that it avoids the big policy questions.

For example, except for calling for free elections, it does not go into the difficult question of the kind of government there should be either in Hanoi or in Saigon, or in what ways it might be desirable to strengthen the local government. Nor does it discuss the character and nature of the troop support which we are supplying, and I think this is perhaps just as well.

We recognize that there is some sensitivity about the advisibility of a resolution of this character; indeed, that feeling has been expressed by a number of speakers during this debate. This sensitivity is primarily the result of recent history.

As one Democrat pointed out, President Johnson vastly increased our military involvement in Vietnam in his search for peace. The inference was clear that President Nixon might do the same in the months ahead, relying on the resolution now under consideration as President Johnson made use of the Tonkin Gulf resolution.

Many of us were serving in Congress in 1964 when the Tonkin Gulf resolution was approved. Some fear that with the passage of this resolution it might be used to justify an escalation of our military involvement in Vietnam, or at least to continue our military support there indefinitely.

In this case of this resolution, however, as I have already pointed out, Congress as a body is taking no action—it will be an expression of the feeling of the House only.

Critics of this resolution have charged that approval would represent a blank check for future action, as well as a specific indorsement of what President Nixon has already done. Of course a reading of the language shows that there is no blanket approval of what the President has done or what he may do. I might point out also that the resolution carefully avoids any criticism, direct or indirect, of actions taken up to this point. This is no criticism of actions taken by former President Johnson even though several Members have expressed such views during debate.

Likewise there is no praise for actions already taken by President Nixon to reduce the extent of our commitment in Vietnam. As a Republican perhaps I should regret that such language was not included, but actually I am thankful that partisanship was avoided in the language used.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I hope that the President succeeds in his efforts to end this war. This job will not be easy. To secure a just peace will be even more difficult, yet it is an objective which we must pursue.

In a recent statement to a group of American Governors visiting in Rome Pope Paul VI expressed his fervent wish for an early end to the war in Vietnam. The Pope recognized, however, that:

> An appropriate means of putting an end to the conflict requires, in present circumstances, a well-mediated and responsible procedure, not only to assure that international obligations are not neglected, that honor and the need not to betray the trust of allies should be fulfilled, but also for the cause and the ideal held by your fellow citizens for which many have sacrificed their lives: aiding people weak and needy of assistance in defense of their right of self-determination and the free promotion of their peaceful development. This cause and this ideal should not be negated. We nourish faith and hope that all who have a part in the Vietnam war will contribute to rendering the (peace) negotiations easier and more expeditious and that these negotiations will very soon lead, not only to end of the conflict, but to peace, a true and lasting peace.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOWENSTEIN).

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, the one thing that this discussion has made clear is that this resolution means all things to all men. Since it means all things to all men, one might assume it really, in the end, means nothing to anyone. Unfortunately, that is not the case.

Clearly, it means something to the President, or we would not have been treated to the special pressures that have assured its passage in this dubious manner. He has told us what it means to him: a blanket endorsement of his speech of November 3, with all its vagaries, inconsistencies, threats and bad history. Members may say what they wish about their intent if they vote "Aye"; the President will act on his version of what they meant. If Tonkin Gulf taught us nothing else, it surely has taught us that.

To the Saigon government it will mean that we are committed to stay in Vietnam until what are called free elections are held. This can only be a renewed announcement to that government—a government which never has believed in free elections—that as long as it can avoid free elections it can count on our continued military presence.

But the very use of the phrase "free elections" in this situation has to be self-deluding, since the Saigon government, over and over again, has told everyone who will listen that it will never allow a government it regards as pro-Communist to take power. So if we are to take this resolution seriously, we must assume that people the Saigon government calls pro-Communist will agree to take part in elections knowing they cannot win; or, alternatively, we must understand that we are committed to staying in Vietnam until a process has occurred which, by definition, cannot occur. That means that we will have to stay in Vietnam for the foreseeable—and unforeseeable—future, in hot pursuit of something which does not and cannot exist.

The procedure we are using to consider this resolution will not help matters much either. That procedure will add to the bitter and growing disunion in this country that distresses some of us so deeply. For whatever the purposes and protests of its sponsors, this is not a unifying resolution to begin with, and to approach its adoption in this way is to make of it a positive force for further dissension. The unifying of free men cannot take place at the cost of their integrity, or of the democratic process.

For one thing, we are told to take it or leave it. Discuss it for 3 minutes each—it and the vast, endless war it concerns—then vote for it or be damned as helping Hanoi. If you do not know what it means, if there is no legislative history, if you are denied the chance to ask questions, or to answer questions, or even to answer innuendoes—forget all that and vote aye, or be accused of opposing and obstructing national unity.

But unity of free men in a divided nation is achieved by people counseling together in good faith and with good will. Discussions—and concessions—must seek common denominators, and procedures must be followed that will minimize resentments and encourage a spirit of trust and genuine effort. Then, tensions and division may ease, feelings of unity may be maximized, and some points of agreement may be found or worked out.

None of that can occur in this atmosphere, or on behalf of this resolution. What facade of agreement may be created by this misleading vote will not survive the most cursory glance through the statements even of those who have voted aye, so many of whom are doing so only after specifically noting that they did so because they do not know what the resolution means and so cannot see how voting for it can do any harm.

And that is certainly an understandable position. But while the meaning of the resolution is unclear, what is clear is that passing it in this fashion is a further abdication of the constitutional obligation of the Congress to declare wars if they are to be fought, and to concern itself with the peace and security of the Nation when they are imperiled.

There is, furthermore, something especially objectionable about passing high-sounding moralistic resolutions about American purposes in Vietnam at this particular moment. To pass this resolution as if the world were not still reeling from the relations about Song My shows all the sensitivity of a stone wall.

In short, you do not unify by shutting off the words of those who do not agree with you. You do not further the quest for a "just peace" in Vietnam by passing resolutions that blunder from incorrect historical recitations to the reiterations of high-sounding, unobtainable, and inconsistent—and, therefore, hypocritical and misleading—goals.

If the goal is really free elections, why do we not help the people of Spain and Greece to get free elections? Are we only for "free elections" where they cannot be obtained even at the price of half a million American troops and vast expenditures of lives and resources? There are places where we can support the principle of free elections and actually save some of our money, by refusing to continue to subsidize governments that spend so much of it and still are not willing to allow their people to vote.

If, on the other hand, the goal is a negotiated peace, surely it is clear by now that that goal cannot be achieved while the Thieu-Ky government is in power, since there is no way that government can stay in power without our military presence and no way the other side can be induced to make peace while Thieu and Ky are in power. Given these facts, one might as well expect the wife of the Attorney General of the United States to lead a peace parade as to expect the Saigon government to let us leave or to negotiate itself out of power.

But it cannot be in the best interests of America to allow our foreign policy—especially on questions of war or peace and life or death—to be determined by foreign governments, least of all, perhaps, by the governments now in power in Saigon and Hanoi.

The national interest of this country requires us to begin immediately the withdrawal of all our Armed Forces from Vietnam on a stated schedule. If, after 7 years of American assistance, after 300,000 U.S. casualties and $115 billion, if the Saigon government cannot now take care of itself against a ruthless and presumably despised Communist dictatorship ruling a smaller country, then perhaps it is time to face the fact squarely that it is not going to be able to do so if we simply keep propping it up for a few more months or years.

Nor is beginning the total withdrawal of all American servicemen going to encourage Hanoi to "wait things out." Does anyone really think Hanoi needs encouragement to "wait things out"? And if they did need such encouragement could we do anything here that would come close to rivaling the encouragement they must have obtained from the President's announcement of the decision of this Government to withdraw our combat troops as soon as practicable? What beginning the total withdrawal of our forces might do is to stop encouraging Saigon to wait things out. For the Saigon government would at last be put on notice that either it must negotiate a political settlement, or it must take over the fighting.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this resolution, so innocent at first glance, so deceptive after analysis, so dangerous in the long run, it can only create further illusion in Saigon and further disillusion in this country. For, however cleverly it confuses the options now available, and no matter how many Members vote for it, nothing can long obscure the determination of the American people to get their troops out of Vietnam. We do no one a service by muddying that central fact with archaic rhetoric about equivocal resolutions.

As Mr. Townsend Hoopes, former Under Secretary of the Air Force, puts it in his brilliant book, "The Limits of Intervention":

> Should the U.S. government pursue a course of partial withdrawal in Vietnam, while leading the American public to believe all will end well, I am afraid a number of unpleasant shocks, surprises, and politically dangerous consequences would arise to confront us. For at best, such a course is a prescription for an interminable war; partially disguised by the declining level of U.S. participation, it would in fact require our country to sustain a continuing burden of war casualties and heavy dollar costs that would become explicitly open-ended as we leveled off our forces at 100,000 men or thereabouts. Sooner or later, and probably sooner, the American people would reawaken to the fact that they were still committed to the endless support of a group of men in Saigon who represented nobody but themselves, preferred war to the risks of a political settlement, and could not remain in power for more than a few months without our large-scale presence.

I include in the RECORD at this point an especially valuable article and editorial from Look, one of America's most distinguished and widely read magazines:

VIETNAM: GET OUT NOW

(By J. Robert Moskin)

We have also failed to create a Vietnamese Army that can carry on its own struggle. To try to achieve that long shot will cost more tens of thousands of American lives.

And we have failed to help build a popular or democratic or cohesive government in Saigon. The current regime is a military dictatorship that depends wholly on our presence.

I have never been a Vietnam hawk either, but I respected the judgment of four U.S. administrations that called the fate of South Vietnam vital to our national interest.

Now, President Nixon has reversed this judgment, for which 39,000 Americans have died, 250,000 have suffered wounds and about $100 billion have been spent. In his policy-setting May 14 speech, he said, "We are prepared to accept any government in South Vietnam that results from the free choice of the South Vietnamese people themselves." This means our Government no longer believes that it is in our vital national interest to keep South Vietnam free from Communism.

It is a fair standard that young Americans should not be ordered to die unless their sacrifice is vital to their country.

We have absolutely no sane reason left for killing more than 1,000 young Americans before the end of this year. Our present course—spooning out American lives in an infinitely complex, inscrutable Asian game—is inexcusable.

It is difficult to conceive that the present South Vietnamese Government can survive the end of the hostilities or that South Vietnam, even if we go on fighting, will not be Communist-dominated soon after we leave. It really doesn't seem to matter whether we march to the transports today or dribble out before the 1970 U.S. elections or over the next three years. The results will be the same—except in the number of the dead.

In 1967, I traveled for Look along the frontier of American power on the western edge of the Pacific Ocean, and came home convinced that our involvement in the future of Asia is irreversible. That conviction remains. We are not about to scurry back into a Fortress America. Our presence across the Pacific is too massive, our interest too deep. But on this latest trip to Vietnam, I saw that we have overreached ourselves. America's historic westward-driving wave has crested.

No one I talked with—certainly no Vietnamese—believes we should stay in Vietnam. Everyone said we should get out. They differed only on the speed with which we should do so. The most militant—sometimes those most scared for their own skins—said in three years. At a conservative estimate of 100 U.S. dead per week, that means 15,600 more coffins.

Why is South Vietnam's political self-determination still worth dying for? Because, I was told in Washington and Saigon, we have committed out word, and if we leave precipitously, our word will be dishonored. We will lose face. Three years ago, Secretary of State Dean Rusk gave me the same reason for continuing this war. He called it "the credibility of the American commitment."

The Nixon Administration believes we will be "severely hurt" if we "bug out." It wants "a reasonable solution," praying for reasonableness from Hanoi while recognizing that it is against the Communists' interest to be "reasonable."

But by staying, are we telling Thailand, for example, that if it gets into trouble with Thai or North Vietnamese guerrillas, we would help? No one expects, I was told, that we would then send an expeditionary force to Thailand.

The outcome of this "war of national liberation" has no relevance to the chances of having more such wars in the future. Just about every Asian leader knows we have had enough in Vietnam.

Singapore's Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew told me, "Vietnam was a bad place to draw the line."

Why then are Americans dying today in Vietnam? To give the South Vietnamese time to prepare to govern themselves and defend themselves. Are these reasonable goals?

We thought they were. We thought the South Vietnamese leaders would use the time we helped buy for them—with American lives and money—to good advantage. But they have not.

You need only go out in the countryside to see the failure of the succession of South Vietnamese governments to win the people's loyalty. Go to the upriver village of Dien Ban, about ten miles south of Danang, our great northern base in Quang Nam Province. You can get in safely only by helicopter. Here, American marines have to wear their flak vests in the road just outside their walled compound. This area has been fought over for years; there is still fighting every day. If the refugees were resettled in the countryside, officials fear, they would join the Vietcong.

I visited Dien Ban with the chief of the pacification program, Ambassador William G. Colby, who ranks Quang Nam 38th out of the 44 provinces in security. Terrorist attacks are heavy: government officials and ordinary civilians are being assassinated, wounded, kidnapped. The province chief, an Army of the Republic of Vietnam (Arvin) colonel, figures that the Vietcong have 900 officials of their own in the province. Our side sends out "Political Recon Units" to terrorize and kill VC leaders.

Destruction in Quang Nam Province has been massive. Five years ago, the province had 557 hamlets; only 308 are left. The number of refugees has jumped in five years from 35,000 to 124,000. (One of every 12 people in South Vietnam is a refugee today.) Less than half of the province's rice land is cultivated. Fishermen may not return to shore after 6 p.m. Anyone walking about in the countryside after dusk without a light is shot automatically. In this province of 540,000 people, only one Vietnamese doctor remains, and while I was there, he was vacationing in West Germany. The people in the villages know nothing about the peace negotiations in Paris.

"Ninety percent of the people would cut our throats if they had the chance," a top American in Quang Nam told me.

Ambassador Colby says, "It's been a war between two aggressors, and the people wish they would both go away."

Warren E. Parker, senior U.S. adviser in the province, describes the situation today: "It's like a Cadillac pushing a Model T through a muddy road with four flat tires with a driver who doesn't know where he's going and doesn't really care."

On an island in the river below the provincial capital of Hoi An sits the Xyuen Long Refugee Camp. It vividly tells part of the story of Vietnam's hopelessness. Here live 3,125 refugees. Only 240 are men. Until this summer, these people all lived on another nearby island that was regarded as a VC stronghold. A swift military sweep scooped up the women and children and a few of the men and transferred them to this desolate sand-dune camp. The rest of the men still are hiding with the VC in the tall grass. Moving their families in this manner made no converts, won no friends.

Yet President Nixon found himself able to tell U.S. troops in Vietnam this summer: "I think history may record this as one of America's finest hours."

In Paris, the diplomats debate semantics over whether troop withdrawals should be called "mutual" or "simultaneous." In Saigon, the politicians, fragmented in dozens of parties, struggle for a piece of the spoils. And out in the countryside—where there is firing every night, assassinations repeatedly, where 12-year-old girls carry rifles—you feel that whatever happens in Paris or Saigon, the word will never get down to the bitter, frightened peasants in the fields and the thatch huts. The struggle, the terror, the dying of this desperate 23-year war—in which more than a million people have been killed and wounded—will go on and on. Says a wise American official there, "You can't negotiate an end of this war. We can only negotiate our way out of it."

In a lovely house in the handsome Paris suburb of Verrières-le-Buisson, Mrs. Nguyen Thi Binh, foreign minister of the National Liberation Front's self-appointed Provisional Revolutionary Government, told me much the same thing in more dogmatic terms. An attractive woman, she left a husband, a boy, 13, and a girl, 9, in Vietnam to head the VC delegation in Paris. Wearing a pale pink ao dai and black silk trousers, she sat in a sunny upstairs parlor next to a vase of red roses. Her eyes were hard, but she smiled as she talked: "I am, politically, a woman who resists American aggression for national independence. I am not a Marxist or a bourgeoisie. I love my country. I long for peace to come back so I can lead a normal life with my children."

But there is no hint of compromise: "If the American Government realizes its erroneous policy of aggression and is willing to end the war of aggression, we are ready to discuss with the American Government putting an end to the conflict. . . . If the American Government obstinately pursues its policy of aggression, the South Vietnamese people are resolved to struggle to victory."

Both sides claim they want elections in South Vietnam, and Mrs. Binh says, "The question is how to organize genuinely free, democratic general elections. The first condition is there must be no presence of American troops of aggression—and without foreign interference.

"I consider the Saigon administration has no competence to organize these elections because if the Saigon administration would organize these elections, they would only give birth to another puppet government.

"The Provisional Revolutionary Government has not asked to organize these elections or put forth election laws, and we [advocate] the formation of a provisional government that will organize the election."

That same day, Nguyen Thanh Le, the thin bespectacled spokesman for the North Vietnamese Government, sat in a room behind a heavily guarded stone wall in the Paris suburb of Choisy-le-Roi, puffed English State Express cigarettes, sipped amber tea from a signeted cup and said, "There can be no genuine free election while 500,000 American troops and 60,000 satellite troops remain in Vietnam." He asked if there could have been free elections in France when it was occupied by Hitler's troops.

I asked him why his government, if its objective is to get the United States out, doesn't agree to a cease-fire and simultaneous withdrawal of U.S. and North Vietnamese troops—and then the Americans would be gone.

Le tapped his right forefinger emphatically on his yellow cigarette box and said slowly, "Let me make it simple. Suppose there is a house, and a robber broke in and wrecks the property and killed the wife and children. The master of the house has the obligation to fight back. Simultaneous mutual withdrawal equates the bandit and the master of the house." He added, "The Johnson war is now becoming the Nixon war. Mr. Nixon is even more cunning, more perfidious."

I asked Le about the fear of many that when U.S. forces get out, there would be a bloodbath, especially of anti-Communist Catholics. He called this propaganda of the ruling class. "There are now in South Vietnam many Catholic patriots and many Catholics and people of other religions who participate in the advisory council of South Vietnam and in the leadership of the NLF and the PRG.

"We have no discrimination against any religion. We unite with every patriot to defend the country. So far, those who previously participated in the puppet administration or army, no matter how their pasts were, if they favor the independence, peace and neutrality of South Vietnam, we will cooperate with them and we welcome them."

In Saigon, Sen. Nguyen Gia Hien, who heads South Vietnam's largest Catholic party and who studied at the University of Montana and Iowa State for six years, disagrees. He foresees a massacre. "I'm sure of it. We are not scared of it. The killing is going on now already, not only soldiers but civilians. They will attack anyone who is not working with them—not only Catholics."

The truth is somewhere between a massacre and a welcome. Certainly, the Communists will try to eliminate their most ardent opponents, and asylum will have to be provided for thousands. But this is a problem that will have to be met whether we get out now or later.

Hien's party, a member of President Nguyen Van Thieu's six-party coalition, the so-called National Social Democratic Front, is strongly anti-Communist and consists mostly of refugees from the North. Hien says it was originally subsidized by the late Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York, and Hien had a three-hour meeting last winter with Terence Cardinal Cooke in New York. Today, Hein accepts the eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops. "Withdrawal of the main American force should take about three years. It was a period of three years. Two years is too quick for us. If after three years we cannot take care of ourselves, we have nobody else to blame. If the Communists take over, some people will fly off, and we will be guerrillas. And it will go on again."

Meanwhile, he presses Thieu for social and land reforms. "We can do more for peace by being more liberal, being better organized, less corrupt."

Truong Dinh Dzu, who ran second to the Thieu-Ky ticket in the 1967 presidential elections and who favored talking peace with the Vietcong and creating a coalition government, was thrown into jail. But there are still some political figures in Saigon who advocate what Le and Mrs. Binh call "independence, peace and neutrality." One such group of intellectuals calls itself the Progressive Nationalist Force. Its chairman is Tran Ngoc Lieng, a 46-year-old lawyer. He told me, "We advocate a complete and immediate cease-fire. We call for a government of reconciliation that will have the responsibility for holding elections in Vietnam." Such a government, he says, would be composed of non-Communist nationalists of both sides, and all its members would have to be acceptable to both sides. This rather idealistic plan would naturally exclude members of the Thieu government as well as the Communists in PRG.

Although Lieng will not admit it, he is reportedly close to Gen. Duong Van "Big" Minh, who is perhaps the nearest thing South Vietnam has to a popular politician and who has now been allowed to return from exile in Thailand.

Saigon politics is atomized among northerners, southerners, several factions of Buddhists, Catholics, religious sects like the Cao Dai and the Hoa Hao, neutralists and anti-Communists. Splitting these groups are layers upon layers of individual feuds and historical animosities that go back to the period of French rule. And, above all, most of the politicians are out for their own gain.

Says retired Maj. Gen. Edward G. Lansdale, who knows Vietnamese politics. "It's a family quarrel, and a very savage one, as a family quarrel can be."

The feuding factions seem no longer able to get together before it is too late. But if these anti-Communist and non-Communist nationalists do not unite, there is no chance that they can survive in the postwar political turmoil.

Sen. Tran Van Don, a former general who led the 1963 overthrow of President Ngo Dinh Diem, says, "The problem is not with the NLF. The problem is inside ourselves . . .

"I don't believe President Thieu can lead the country alone. He needs to rally the army and the people. It is not enough to rally the United States. But he is very proud. He is very jealous of his power. He wants to keep power for himself. I think he would like to become a dictator."

Responsible estimates of the number of political prisoners being held by the Thieu government range as high as 30,000. Many politicians, editors, intellectuals have been jailed by military courts or by "administrative procedures" at the government's whim. They are held for arbitrary lengths of time. The secretary general of the House of Deputies of the National Assembly, Tran Ngoc Chau, says. "Many times people get kidnapped in the streets and taken to places no one knows about."

A woman secretary in the National Assembly was jailed for a month because she has a relative in the Vietcong. A neutralist politician was given a year in prison for calling an illegal meeting—a press conference. A Saigon University professor's two-year sentence for criticizing U.S. policy was suspended; but ten months later, he was still held on the prison island of Poulo Condore. Publisher Nguyen Lau of the Saigon Daily News was sentenced to five years because he talked with a Vietcong agent. (Thirty newspapers have been closed down.) Such cases do not increase confidence in the possibility of free elections.

U.S. Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker does not condone these actions, but he says, "We have to remember they are at war. The war is right on their own soil—right in Saigon."

A courageous lawyer, Tran Van Truyen, 56, who has represented a number of such political defendants, says, "We have a national assembly, the president of the republic elected by a general election. But I tell you we have a seeming democracy. . . . This government permits no criticism."

Sen. Tran Van Lam, a leader of Thieu's National Social Democratic Front who became South Vietnam's foreign minister in the recent cabinet shuffle, wants the military courts eliminated and all cases tried in civil courts.

Of an American withdrawal, Lam says: "Personally, I think it would be a very good thing. This must be a Vietnamese war."

The government in Saigon is not a popular government. It is basically an army regime, and the people universally fear the army—any army. Hopes that the cabinet changes in September would bring into the government a broader range of civilian views were dashed by the appointment of a right-wing general as prime minister.

The real power behind this government is in the hands of the generals, and Thieu has constantly resisted American pressure to democratize his methods and broaden his political base. What little has been achieved is mainly the result of American persuasion and arm-twisting. Ambassador Bunker, Thieu's confidant, has by all accounts been superb at this. But it has not been enough. A knowledgeable American in Saigon says of Thieu, "He wouldn't have a chance in hell if the Communists weren't pounding at the gates."

The Vietcong obviously want to avoid an election, even if internationally supervised, that would be managed on the rice-roots level by province chiefs, district chiefs, soldiers and police beholden to Thieu. The common guess in Saigon is that the Vietcong's Provisional Revolutionary Government would win 20 to 25 percent of the vote. But since Thieu won in 1967 with only 35 percent, and a major part of that came from the army and the bureaucracy, he has little margin of safety. With the PRG putting up a common front and the Saigon politicians divided, the political struggle threatens to be as hopeless as the military one has been.

Since a political solution that will leave South Vietnam non-Communist is so iffy, it's up to the army, the Arvin, to hold off the Communists. Crucial is the speed with which the Arvin can replace the GI's. The process of preparing the Arvin to take over the fighting is what we mean by "Vietnamization."

U.S. officers now admit that one of the great failures of our military effort has been our neglect of the Arvin. The result of this—plus the Arvin's war weariness, corruption, low pay and the killing off of many of the best officers—is an army that is incapable of defending its country, even if given all the benefits of the United States technology.

Says one American general in a position to judge, "They'll be reasonably self-sufficient in time—three years from now." The question is, can we wait?

When Vietnamization started, no one expected to prepare the Arvin to handle the North Vietnamese Army. The hope was that, in time, it could stand up to the Vietcong. Now, the Nixon Administration dreams of preparing the Arvin to cope with the NVA, too, as a possible alternative to mutual withdrawal.

Of course, even if a cease-fire or peace were arranged and/or American forces withdrawn, there is no way to insure against reinvasion from the North in overwhelming force months after we go.

Ironically, the greatest American hero of the war, Gen. William C. Westmoreland, who commanded our forces there and now is the U.S. Army's Chief of Staff, has become a scapegoat in Vietnam. Some American officers who want to keep fighting today claim that Westmoreland fought the war all wrong, "clobbering everything in sight" in World War II style with big unit battles and massive air support, while the enemy was fighting a semi-guerrilla war.

The military public relations people's new hero is Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, the able current U.S. military commander, whom they love to call "The Spoiler." Abrams' approach is not to wait until the enemy has massed but to hit him as he is preparing his battlefield and gathering his forces from his headquarters safely out of reach in Cambodia.

Abrams told me, "There is a limit to what the United States can do. The solution here has to be Vietnamese." He adds, "I'm in favor of taking out some American troops. There is such a thing as helping too much."

Yet, the fact remains that the Arvin continues to need a great deal of help. It has three main problems. First, it is hated and feared by its own people. One American official in the field tells how a Vietnamese Ranger battalion, supposedly an elite unit, recently went through a village, stealing chickens and belongings. He says with disgust, "You don't make friends that way."

Second, a tremendous effort is needed to train the Arvin's officers and men to handle complex weapons and communications systems, from radios to helicopters. As an American officer told me sardonically, "We'll know we're making progress when we can get a phone call to the Arvin straight."

Third—and most urgent of all—is the problem of leadership. American observers say the Vietnamese, when properly motivated and led, can be excellent soldiers. But the Arvin's officers and even noncoms are too often personally overambitious and corrupt.

All in all, I return from Vietnam this time with a sense of hopelessness, deeper perhaps than the personal despair expressed by Look correspondent Sam Castan before he was killed in combat there in 1966.

Politically and militarily, the South Vietnamese are still, after all these years, not yet prepared to take care of themselves. It would cost more thousands of American lives to give them any chance to do so. Now that our Government no longer judges it vital to our security that South Vietnam not go Communist, what justification is there for further American sacrifices?

The simple truth is that the price of keeping South Vietnam non-Communist has been raised to a level the American people are no longer willing to pay. That is a realistic definition of defeat.

If we learn the lesson of Vietnam—that American power has its limitations—this war may at least mark the end of an era and the beginning of a new, less punitive and more imaginative role in the world for the United States.

AN EDITORIAL: A VICTORY WE CAN WIN

LOOK's May 14, 1968, issue carried an editorial which concluded that "the most important national business before us in this year of political debate is to wind up our involvement in the Vietnam war as quickly and as honorably as possible, and to go on from there to the creation of a world order in which America's ingenuity will truly serve the cause of peace."

Eighteen months, scores of meetings, hundreds of speeches, thousands of deaths, millions of tears and billions of wasted dollars later, we think these words are worth repeating—here at the end of Bob Moskin's eloquent report—in the hope that someday soon, someone in Washington will have the courage to say: "We made a mistake. This is not our war. Let's stop it—now."

Simple? Yes. Politically risky? Perhaps. Humiliating? No—because that would be a new kind of American victory—a victory won over our own willful and self-defeating pride. A victory the whole world would applaud.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SCHADEBERG).

Mr. SCHADEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613. One of the reasons we do not yet enjoy peace in Vietnam is that the military junta government in North Vietnam, which is not in power by the expressed will of the people, who have not enjoyed the right of free elections, has interpreted the division in this Nation created over our participation in Vietnam to mean a loss of confidence not only in the leadership of this country, but in our ability to win a military victory in Vietnam. It is not my desire to impugn the loyalty or patriotism of any citizen who chooses to oppose verbally and/or by demonstration the policy of our Government but the fact remains that the prime movers of the organized opposition to our Vietnam policy have intentionally or unintentionally given aid and comfort to the enemy. How else can we interpret it when the Hanoi government openly praises the efforts of the demonstrations that keep the wounds of disunity festering.

Be that as it may the time has come for this House to be about its business of closing ranks to give the President the broad base of support necessary in his negotiations to bring our participation in this war to its earliest honorable conclusion. Without closing ranks there can be only two alternatives open to us: (a) outright surrender or (b) escalation of the war. To escalate the war in Vietnam would be, I believe, to break faith with the American people. It would put this Nation in the untenable situation of being the aggressors in Vietnam. This is the label, false to be sure, that is pinned on us by an enemy expert, as it is unprincipled, in its propaganda efforts. What is needed is not an escalation but a definite deescalation of the military activities. Our President is committed to a policy of deescalation and he deserves our support.

It would be most unwise to accept outright surrender in Vietnam not only because of the loss of honor for this Nation; or because it would result in having our young men who have served in Vietnam to have made their sacrifices in vain—but because it would open the door for the next world war which must be avoided if at all possible. It would be an admission that we cannot win the war or at least be interpreted by the Communist world as our inability to win. I heard on this floor a statement by one of my colleagues that the war in Vietnam is "a war we cannot win." Nothing could be further from the truth.

To repudiate our responsibility as the leader of the free world would be an admission to the world, friend or foe alike, that we are so weak we cannot cope with a third or fourth rate government like Hanoi.

Worst yet, it would be interpreted as a moral weakness that indicated not only that we did not really believe in freedom but that we lack the moral fibre to meet tyranny face to face and oppose it.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an invitation at appeasement that would merely delay the final confrontation and bring the world to a total war just as appeasement of the Kaiser led to World War II and appeasement of the Communists in Korea to the Korean police action. Because of our appeasement of the North Korean Government the Korean war deteriorated to a point at which our hands were tied. We secured a truce in warfare but could no longer pursue our efforts to bring to Korea a just or even a lasting peace.

If you have any doubts about what the intention of the supporters of Communist tyranny have toward further aggression, or if you have any doubts as to why the supporters of Communist tyranny chose to bog us down in the battlefield, you should read the official report by the Government of China giving its assessment of the United States following the temporary settlement of the Korean war in which we did not demand a victory. In this report the Chinese interpreted our failure to win not only as a lack of will to win, born out of ignorance of our political system and our loyalty to the cause of freedom, but as a lack of military means. It is no wonder the small communistic group of tyrants have chosen to meet us on the battlefields of Vietnam. No one knowledgeable of our military strength could honestly question our military capacity to wipe the whole of Vietnam off the map in 1 week if we chose to release our full capabilities.

Our leadership, committed to responsible action in this nuclear age, has felt there is another way to solve our differences besides all-out war which might well engulf the world in its clutches. It has chosen the more difficult and painful solution—limited war. After great sacrifices in a limited war policy designed to remove the threat of an all-out war, we are on the verge of bringing the enemy to its knees. But we are being denied victory because some chose to give Hanoi the spark of hope that our will—not our ability, but our will—to preserve freedom for others will soon break and we will turn tail, repudiate our sense of honor, and abandon those who look to us for help.

I want this war to come to an end now, but I do not want peace at the price of honor, or the future of freedom for anyone, including our own loved ones. I believe that this generation would not knowingly want to avoid this confrontation if it means that in a few years their brothers or their children could be faced with the necessity of conflict on the battlefields, either within the continental limits or one of the States separated from our shores, or any other area critical to the division of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I support this resolution and urge my colleagues to give to the President a helping hand in his efforts with honor.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. DENNIS).

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. Chairman, I support House Resolution 613 for a number of reasons but chiefly because, under the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, support for the resolution is to be equated with support for the policy of the President of the United States in regard to Vietnam; and I believe that today it is of the first importance to our country to have an overwhelming expression of such support, and that this resolution is the best vehicle available by which to obtain such an expression.

The resolution itself, like most human efforts, is imperfect, and there is at least one point contained therein which I believe requires interpretation and understanding—I refer to the reference to free elections in South Vietnam and the willingness of the United States to abide by the results thereof. It should be emphasized, I think, that free elections mean election's truly free, and consequently that any participation therein by the Vietcong must necessarily be by a reformed and peaceful Vietcong, which has renounced the use of force, and which has itself resolved to abide by the results of a free election. Such a development would seem to be unlikely.

Again while the resolution is a resolution for peace and, as such, properly confines itself basically, and in terms, to that field, it in no sense rules out a peace brought about in part by United States military action or assistance. if that proves to be necessary, nor does it mandate the President to commit our country to any hasty or ill considered military withdrawal, or to a withdrawal by a date certain to be announced in advance.

On the contrary this resolution, at the time and under the circumstances of its adoption, is and must be preeminently an endorsement of the Vietnam policies of the President; and it is with that understanding that I support and vote for this resolution.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE).

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. Chairman, I cosponsored this resolution, and I want to make it clear I did so on the basis of an understanding that the President was specifically requesting my support.

While I believe this resolution is sadly deficient in many ways, I will support a diplomatic initiative which the President judges to serve the cause of ending the war and achieving peace.

I did pose a question to the sponsor of this resolution, the gentleman from Texas, earlier. I asked him if this resolution authorized or delegated any war-making powers to the President in any way.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIEGLE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I am a consponsor of the resolution, and I have answered that question at least six or seven times during the course of the debate. The answer is categorically "No."

Mr. RIEGLE. I am glad to have it there again.

I believe this resolution in no way repeats the tragedy of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Let me assure the Members that I intend to continue to press for the repeal of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution effective December 31, 1970.

Now I am not bothered by what is contained in this resolution, but I am deeply distressed about what is not there.

Let me catalog the major weaknesses in this resolution.

First, it fails to say anything about American troop withdrawals or the Vietnamization program.

Second, it fails to address the question of stopping American combat deaths.

Third, it fails to call on the South Vietnamese regime to end political repression, broaden its base, carry out meaningful land reform, improve the quality of life for the villagers, end government corruption and inefficiency, solve the refugee problem, and take over all combat responsibility—among other things.

But the most discouraging thing about this proceeding has been the total destruction of meaningful legislative process by the power structure of this House.

To ram this resolution through committee—without hearings—to bring it to the floor under a closed rule—to limit debate—and to purposely gut the motion to recommit—is a disappointing use of arbitrary power.

What is it that the leadership in both parties is so afraid of? Why is open debate and an open amendment process so dangerous? Perhaps what we are afraid of is the truth.

We have experienced 8 years of undeclared war. We threw the Constitution of the United States out of the window on this war.

Over 40,000 Americans are dead.

Over 300,000 Americans wounded.

We have dropped more bombs than in all of World War II.

I believe the leadership of both parties condemns itself when, by token actions like these, it shows so little respect for the massive sacrifices and agonies this war has already afflicted on America. The procedures used on this resolution are an act of fear by this House. We are ducking the issue; we are not facing up to it.

If this body had courage equal to our soaring rhetoric and artful dodging on this issue of war, we would go into continuous session, around the clock, 7 days a week, either to require an orderly withdrawal from Vietnam consistent with the safety of our troops—or declare outright war.

I support what is contained in this resolution, but feel a great sadness for what is not contained there.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. RYAN).

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, while House Resolution 613 may appear rather innocuous on its face, it must be viewed in the context of the President's November 3 address to the Nation, its introduction in the House of Representatives on November 4, and the interpretation placed upon it by the President himself in his unprecedented visit to the House on November 13.

The President in thanking the cosponsors said:

> Yesterday I was informed by a bipartisan group from the House of Representatives that over 300 Members of the House had joined in sponsoring a resolution for a just peace in Vietnam along the lines of the proposal that I made in a speech on November 3.

The President went on to observe:

> But I do not know when the great issues are involved, that in this House, that what happened yesterday with that announcement on the part of Members of both sides of the aisle of well over a majority supporting the policy of the President of the United States, I realize that that was in the great tradition of this country.

So, in the words of the President, this is a "resolution for a just peace in Vietnam along the lines of the proposal that I made in a speech on November 3." It will be used as an endorsement of his policy. In fact, Ambassador Lodge has already used the fact that over 300 Members of Congress support this resolution as evidence of overwhelming support in America for the President's position.

If the House feels that an endorsement of the President's plan of November 3 is justified, then House Resolution 613 should be supported. However, let us not deceive ourselves as to how approval of the resolution will be construed.

This is the first time, except for supplemental Vietnam and other military authorization and appropriation bills, that the House has had the opportunity to deal with U.S. policy in Vietnam since 1964.

There should be a full scale debate with the opportunity to offer amendments and to consider alternatives to the administration's policy in Vietnam. Instead, the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the House Rules Committee have done their utmost to see that the resolution is swiftly passed with a minimum of debate.

The fact that House Resolution 613 has been brought before the House under a parliamentary procedure which forecloses such a debate on the most crucial issue before the Nation is sufficient reason to oppose it.

The language of the resolution is vague. The phrase "a just peace" is not defined, and the House Foreign Affairs Committee held no hearings to help establish a legislative history.

The lesson of the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution should not be disregarded. That resolution was completely distorted and used by President Johnson to justify committing half a million American servicemen to a land war in Asia without a declaration of war. House Resolution 613, as already interpreted by the President, is broad enough to give him a free hand to take whatever action he feels is necessary to achieve "a just peace"—however he may define the term.

Although the resolution speaks of the President's efforts in negotiations, the President's emphasis upon Vietnamization of the conflict and the resignations of Ambassador Lodge and his deputy suggest that the administration is not vigorously pursuing a negotiated settlement.

The Paris talks are not stalled because of domestic criticism of the administration's policy.

Sponsors of the resolution have put together a compilation of statements made by critics of our Vietnam policy which have been used by the North Vietnamese delegation in Paris. This compilation is used to show "how statements and actions by a few Members of the U.S. Congress have given grist to the enemy propaganda mills—and how they are used to delay progress toward a settlement." The effect is to attempt to stifle dissent.

Do the sponsors of the resolution really believe that approval of this resolution will improve our negotiating position in Paris by showing that the Nation is united behind presidential policy on Vietnam?

Approval of this resolution will in no way change the fact that this country is divided over our course in Vietnam. Nor will it be of any assistance to our negotiating position in Paris. The Paris talks are not stalled because of statements made by Members of Congress and other Americans who do not agree with present policy.

One reason that the talks are stalled is because this administration, as did the previous administration, refuses to accept the political reality that the National Liberation Front or the Vietcong has a role in the political future of South Vietnam. Another reason is the administration's failure to seize possible openings for new initiatives.

For instance, in his November 3 speech President Nixon referred to his letter of July 15 to Ho Chi Minh in which he said that he was willing to discuss specifically the 10-point program of the National Liberation Front.

The response which came back from Ho Chi Minh said clearly that the 10 points of the National Liberation Front were a "logical and reasonable basis for the settlement of the Vietnamese problem."

That letter was dismissed in the President's speech, as showing Hanoi's unwillingness to negotiate, but I suggest that it was dismissed either without a critical analysis of the import of its meaning or else simply in an effort to persuade the American people that a meaningful initiative had been rejected.

Since the night of his speech, the President's interpretation of that letter has been challenged by many Americans, who viewed the letter as an invitation to pursue negotiations.

Ambassador Averell Harriman suggested that the letter's last paragraph was a "wide open invitation."

Senator EDMUND MUSKIE also saw the paragraph as "an invitation" to pursue negotiations. Senator MUSKIE further questioned why the White House not only took the letter as a rejection of the President's negotiating offer, but also why it did not use the letter to discuss the matter further with Ho's successors.

The criteria for the withdrawal of ground combat forces and their replacement by South Vietnamese forces as stated by the President in his speech are progress at the Paris talks, the level of enemy activity, and the progress of the training program of South Vietnamese forces. These factors are not within our control but will be determined by the Governments of North Vietnam and South Vietnam.

The concept of Vietnamization goes back to our original involvement in Vietnam. Then the policy was to train and provide military assistance to Vietnamese forces. It did not work. and in 1965 the war was Americanized. Throughout the Johnson administration, the concept of Vietnamization was still a basis of our policy.

Now, in 1969, this administration is again talking about Vietnamizing the war. If the quality of the South Vietnamese forces could not be improved in 15 years to the point where they can fight for themselves, how do we expect it to be accomplished in the near future?

The last of the criteria is the level of enemy action. This war has been going on for over 25 years. How can we base our withdrawal on enemy activity when it has ebbed and flowed for over a quarter of a century. The President's unspecified timetable for withdrawal is based upon factors over which we really have little or no control.

In addition, the President stated that, if enemy activity increases, he will not hesitate to react accordingly. Here, he committed the United States to win the peace—and left the door open to possible escalation.

The President has stated that we no longer expect a military victory, but in his speech he spoke in terms of winning, which could mean an indefinite military presence in South Vietnam. Since the start of the Paris talks in May 1968, more than 17,000 Americans have sacrificed their lives in Vietnam. We cannot afford to let more young men die in order to soothe national pride.

The supporters of the resolution have ignored the problem of the Saigon regime. Although the resolution supports the concept of free elections open to all South Vietnamese, the resolution does not face the problem of the undemocratic, corrupt regime in Saigon.

President Thieu promised a broad-based government and then jailed his opposition. Over 75 percent of the population of South Vietnam, according to Ambassador Averell Harriman, are anti-Communist. However, they do not participate in the government in Saigon. The resolution does not insist upon the broadening of the government of South Vietnam.

At a time when millions of Americans want the United States to withdraw from Vietnam the resolution does not even mention troop withdrawals. Supporters of the resolution argue that the House should not advise the President about a timetable in that it does not know what the future military possibilities are. By not including any reference to withdrawals, this resolution will not impress upon the President that Americans want a withdrawal of troops as soon as possible.

If the House is serious about advising the President upon policy, and not simply giving him a blank check, then it should set forth its views on troop withdrawals.

The House has every right to demand that troop withdrawal continue on a regular basis. I am a cosponsor along with 13 other Members of the House of House Concurrent Resolution 403 which expresses the sense of the Congress that all U.S. forces should now be withdrawn from Vietnam, the pace of the withdrawal to be limited only by steps to insure the safety of our forces, and that the United States should assist in the provision of asylum in friendly countries for those Vietnamese who might be endangered by our disengagement. The sponsors of our resolution feel that the House must heed the concern which was shown throughout the country on October 15 and in Washington on November 15.

Only the U.S. Congress has the constitutional power to declare war. Yet 40,000 American lives have been lost in a war that is undeclared. Certainly the House should let the President know whether or not the war should be continued.

Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to vote for a resolution which will be construed as support for a policy which is perpetuating the tragic war in Vietnam which I have consistently opposed from its inception. The time has come for the House of Representatives to face squarely the consequences both at home and abroad of this disastrous chapter in American history.

I include at this point in the RECORD a very well-reasoned editorial from the New York Times of November 7, 1969, which discusses the administration's open-ended commitment to Saigon which this resolution supports:

COMMITMENT TO SAIGON

The House Foreign Affairs Committee's approval yesterday of President Nixon's efforts "to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam" implies an endorsement of his policies hardly justified by the President's address to the nation earlier this week. Mr. Nixon's long-heralded "plan for peace" has emerged, in fact, as a familiar program that contains nothing new and is founded on old premises and policies that have mired the United States in a debilitating conflict of indeterminate duration in Southeast Asia.

Many Americans, including even some of the strongest former supporters of the war, long ago concluded that Vietnam is not so vital to United States interests as they once thought it was and therefore is not worth the terrible price in American and Vietnamese lives and resources the war is exacting. This tardy public awakening would be a powerful argument in support of a President determined to unite the nation for a compromise peace.

Mr. Nixon instead has chosen to resurrect by implication, the old concept of a Communist monolith poised to conquer the world, which does not conform to the political reality of the present day. He has revived and expanded the thesis of former Secretary Rusk that a row of tottering dominoes stretching from Bangkok to Berlin to Buenos Aires has only the American-backed regime in Saigon standing in the way of worldwide disaster. If the President really believes his own rhetoric, how could he possibly settle for less than the "victory" in South Vietnam that even Lyndon Johnson finally despaired of winning?

Mr. Nixon's plan for victory—to "win America's peace," is the way he put it—depends upon a continuing military effort, but with South Vietnamese troops increasingly relieving American troops of the main burden of fighting. This program of "Vietnamization" is based on assumptions repeatedly advanced in the past and repeatedly discredited; that is, that the present Saigon Government is growing stronger and will soon be able to stand on its own feet, and that the enemy is growing weaker and will fade away.

If during the course of a prolonged American withdrawal enemy forces should strike hard again, as they are likely to do, and if South Vietnamese troops should fail to meet the test, as they have failed in the past, President Nixon has vowed "to take strong and effective measures to deal with the situation." He has thus again committed the United States to protect the present regime in Saigon as long as that regime is unable to protect itself.

This open-ended commitment to Saigon is, in fact, inconsistent with the Asian Doctrine the President wisely enunciated at Guam. It means that the level of American participation in Southeast Asia, and therefore the limits of American capacity to deal with other problems at home and abroad, will be determined not by Washington but by the actions of Saigon and the reactions of Hanoi and its allies.

President Nixon says the only alternative to his strategy is "precipitate withdrawal of all Americans from Vietnam without regard to the effects of that action." This is not the only alternative. Nor is it the position of the sober majority of Vietnam war critics, despite the President's implication that it is. Most critics of Vietnam policies, old and new, believe that what is required is steady, orderly withdrawal of American forces from South Vietnam under conditions that offer maximum safeguards against the massacres and other calamities Mr. Nixon predicts.

It is conceivable that this kind of determined, deliberate withdrawal is what Mr. Nixon really has in mind. There are passages in his speech that encourage such an interpretation, as do predictions from Saigon that all American combat troops will be out of South Vietnam by the end of next year. If this is the case, it is most unfortunate that the President chose to confuse his true purpose with rhetoric reminiscent of the disastrous past, rhetoric which is not likely to deter the enemy or his critics but which could seriously limit his options in the difficult days ahead.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. VIGORITO).

Mr. VIGORITO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I have been very pessimistic with respect to our entire involvement in Vietnam ever since the campaign of 1964. I am still pessimistic about it. I am also pessimistic with regard to the negotiations. I do not believe anything final will come of the negotiations in Paris. The Vietcong and the North Vietnamese will stay in Paris until hell freezes over. We cannot force them to negotiate. They will not fight until they are defeated; they will quit and come back to fight another day. However, let me say that I am in favor of negotiations. I wish the President luck in negotiations, and from the bottom of my heart I wish the President success.

Our country surely needs peace. The world needs peace. I am definitely against escalating the war. No matter what we do, we cannot dictate to the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong. Again, I repeat, I wish the President all the luck in the world in his attempts to bring us peace.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. PELLY).

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Chairman, as a cosponsor of House Resolution 613, I fully support it. I want to support President Nixon in his attempt to obtain a just peace in Vietnam.

This resolution expresses a hope for peace, and it approves the principles expressed by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to their own Government determined by free elections, impartially supervised by an international body.

It states that this Nation is willing to abide by the results of such an election, and it supports the President's call upon North Vietnam to state its willingness to honor such an election and to allow the issues to be peacefully resolved in order that we may end this war and that peace may be restored.

It is my conviction, Mr. Chairman, that the President is best able to make decisions on this war on the basis of facts immediately available to him and not available to the Members of Congress.

I stand behind President Nixon in his efforts to end this war in Vietnam, and I fully support House Resolution 613.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. LENNON).

Mr. LENNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613. I am very proud to announce that I am a cosponsor of an identical resolution, House Resolution 682.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, it is my considered opinion that the language contained in this resolution represents, I honestly believe, the sentiments of at least 90 or 95 percent of the more than one-half million people that I have the honor to represent in this House of Representatives. They have already indicated that fact to me in a number of petitions which have been signed by tens of thousands of them.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. WALDIE).

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Chairman, I again refer to the President's statement made in 1960 during the Kennedy-Nixon debates—

We cannot tolerate a Communist government in South Vietnam.

Mr. Chairman, the authors of this resolution concede that a Communist government would be tolerated and accepted by this House if such government comes into power by reason of elections called for in this resolution.

That brings into contention an awful lot of problems. If the domino theory that the President announced on November 3 and extended to West Berlin has any relevance, a Communist government in South Vietnam, no matter how it comes into being, will bring into play the domino theory and all its catastrophic consequences.

Supporting this resolution is support for the possibility and acceptability of a Communist government in South Vietnam and the acceptability then of the domino theory coming into play.

The other obvious defect with this resolution is that the President's hands are tied as a result of the resolution and if in the opinion of the negotiators in Paris, a coalition government should be established in South Vietnam it places both the President and the negotiators in a very awkward position in an effort to reach such an agreement with the parties at the peace conference, because this resolution precludes such a result.

The only way you can arrive at a government in South Vietnam, if this resolution is passed, is by free elections. I do not think it is in the best interest of our negotiators in Paris nor the President to bind them in any way from considering the proposition of a coalition government by agreement of all parties. This resolution would not permit that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. REID).

Mr. REID of New York. I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

First of all, I think that the procedure in the House, both in committee and on the floor, regarding this resolution, has been regrettable.

For instance, I know of no major foreign policy resolution going through the Senate with no hearings and with no possibility for amendment. Indeed, previous resolutions—the Formosa resolution, the Middle East resolution, the Berlin resolution and the Cuban resolution—have at least had hearings, scant as they may have been at times. Surely the House can make no serious pretense to being a thoughtful deliberative body if on great questions such as Vietnam it refuses to hold hearings or provide for amendments. This proceeding degrades the House.

It is sadly apparent that the House has learned little from the intense feelings that this question of Vietnam is the paramount issue facing America. To be denied an opportunity to amend this resolution in the first formal opportunity that has been given us since August of 1964 is to make this debate largely meaningless and to make a mockery of the democratic process.

There are few who would question that any President of the United States is strengthened by strong support in the Congress and in the country for a particular position. The fundamental point, however, one which Winston Churchill well understood, is that a policy, to be truly meaningful, must be clearly and precisely understood. The people must participate in the decision relative to it, and only if this process is carried forward will any policy have national sanction at home or be respected abroad. The procedure followed here today, let alone the substance of the resolution we are discussing, are not calculated to achieve that objective.

This resolution, I believe, must be read in conjunction with President Nixon's speech of November 3. Specifically, as the President said on the floor of this House:

> The resolution for a just peace in Vietnam is along the lines of the proposals that I made in a speech on November 3.

The speech stressed the importance of Vietnamization, a policy which has been largely discredited in the past, implicitly committed this action to defend the present Government of South Vietnam until it can defend itself, and raised the possibility, should there be an increase in violence jeopardizing our remaining forces, that the United States would take "strong and effective measures" to deal with that situation. Moreover, the rate of U.S. withdrawal was posited on the progress at the Paris talks, the level of enemy activity, and the progress of the training program of the South Vietnamese forces.

The problem with this formulation, as I see it, is that it could leave the initiative largely to Hanoi, the NLF, and Saigon, none of whom have shown a total sense of urgency to end the war, rather than with the United States where the initiatives should be.

No one would question the desirability of achieving a just peace. The problem occurs over what this phrase means and whether it implies, directly or indirectly, the perpetuation of a Thieu-Ky regime which to date has narrowed its Cabinet base and refused to change its constitution to permit free elections and self-determination for all South Vietnamese. Moreover a continuation of this regime may make any negotiations impossible. Certainly giving Saigon a veto over the peace talks or U.S policy is a mistake.

Hence, the danger of this resolution is clear. We can all find phrases in it with which we agree; equally, we can find phrases which are vague and which could represent unspecified commitments for the future. The difficulty, then, is the interpretation given to it, or to be more precise, the numerous interpretations which could be given to it.

Prior to any action, the simple introduction of the resolution was assigned importance by the President, and by the press, and by the President's negotiators in Paris. As reported by Drew Middleton from Paris in the November 14 New York Times, Ambassador Lodge took the unusual step of introducing into his formal statement at the peace talks the text of the resolution as an indication of support for the policies enunciated in the President's November 3 speech. And this, we recall, was before the House as a body had even begun consideration of the resolution, with signatures collected prior to the President's speech. This presumed on the action the House and Senate might take in a context where the Congress has been derelict in its responsibilities. This did not heighten the credibility of congressional action, nor enhance respect for the resolution—particularly as it coincided with some half a million Americans arriving in Washington to protest these very policies.

As this is a simple House resolution and not a joint resolution, and as it cannot be signed into law, it will not enjoy the importance of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Moreover, the minority leader in the Senate, along with the majority leader, have suggested a significant amendment calling for a mutual ceasefire; hence, whatever action the other body takes will not parallel the action we take in the House today.

Nonetheless, I am constrained to vote against the resolution as the subject is just too important for hasty action, and too significant in its potential implications not to enjoy the degree of national sanction that comes only from full debate, amendments, and the deep conviction of hopefully all the Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REID of New York. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I know that my friend, the gentleman from New York, is a fair-minded Member and a constructive Member, and that he would not intentionally cast unfair criticism upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs or upon the Committee on Rules as to the manner in which this resolution has come to the floor.

But the gentleman is aware, I am sure, that on seven occasions in the past 15 years, foreign policy resolutions have come to the House, in all cases under what amounts to a closed rule. It is not accurate either to say that on all of those occasions there were more or longer committee hearings than on this. In one case, in fact, on the resolution which was introduced on Hungary, a resolution in the 85th Congress, it was passed by the House on the same day of its introduction. So there were not any hearings there.

Then on the Cuban resolution, there were executive sessions, but no hearings.

On the United Nations resolution in the 88th Congress, there were no hearings or calling of witnesses.

In fact, only one of the seven resolutions had printed hearings available for the Members of the House. I am not saying that is always the procedure which should be followed. But I just believe the gentleman from New York in all fairness would want to take note of the fact that this is not an altogether unusual procedure, and that the Committee on Foreign Affairs did consider it and felt that, this being an initiative on the part of the House, they needed no outside advice.

Mr. REID of New York. Let me tell the gentleman that I very much appreciate his comments. Let me say, however, that the precedents the gentleman cites are precisely the reason why there must be changes in our procedures for the future. I would say to him, and this is a point I am trying to make, that the House ought to be coequal with the other body in foreign policy resolutions, and will be only when this House accepts its responsibilities.

In short, what is essential is full hearings, a longer time for debate than 4 hours every 5 years, and an end to closed rules in general. Only as a legislative body truly reflects the commitments and convictions of all American people will its resolutions command the respect and credibility that bespeaks a national purpose and hopefully unity.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS).

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I am not a sponsor of this resolution.

But I am going to vote for it here today because I sincerely hope that by voting for it, it may help the cause of peace and that it may in some way—some way that is, frankly, vague to me—help to disengage us from this most unfortunate experience that we have had in this war.

I regret, as have many Members here today, that this House has not taken a more vigorous position in the Vietnam war; that it has not had a more definite position on what should be done about it. I hope though that the leaders of this body will have learned from all these circumstances that it really is impossible to get something very meaningful from this Congress or from the House of Representatives unless the Congress is able to work its will. Procedures that do not allow for committee do not provide for adequate committee hearings and do not allow amendment of resolutions on the floor, really amount to naught.

I come from a part of the country where we have broad beaches and where the tide ebbs and flows every day. Sometimes sitting here and listening to this debate here reminds me of those Florida beaches that I see. Oftentimes you will see very earnest people working down on the beaches building beautiful sand castles. They work all day. When the tide comes in at night, those same castles are washed away and the beach the next day looks as if it had never been disturbed. I hope this resolution will just not turn out to be just another sand castle. But I am afraid it might.

Mr. Chairman, I am impressed with the discussion here today.

There certainly has not been any of the emotionalism which I remember at the time of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. The only reasons I am going to vote for this resolution is because I think it is a peace resolution.

I had some misgivings when the debate first began, but most of the debate and the answers by the sponsors and the answers by the people controlling the time on the debate have convinced me that this resolution is designed to achieve a quick and just peace.

I am going to vote for it on that basis and on that basis alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CLARK).

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I support this resolution. First, I would like to congratulate the Speaker for bringing up this resolution at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate Mr. HAYS, of Ohio, who has done such an excellent job on the chairing of this resolution today. He is a forthright, honest, hardworking Congressman who knows how important it is to be American first Democrat second.

I cannot understand why we have these few Members in Congress who oppose this resolution. To me they give promise and hope to the Vietcong and Hanoi.

They talk about the thousands killed. Yet they do not say that it was the Vietcong and North Vietnamese Government who has done it. They talk, instead, about those, our American soldiers have killed. They forget that every time one of our Presidents has called a cessation of bombing or ground attacks that the enemy brought in their artillery and rockets—indiscriminately bombing civilians.

I clearly recognize the constitutional right of any citizen, or group of citizens, to make their views known to their public officials. It is not only their right, but their duty. I also recognize the right of other citizens to disagree. But, I cannot fathom how it is stupid of SPIRO AGNEW to support his President—your President—but it is sublime to attack that same President.

Why is it suddenly more American to raise a Vietcong flag at the Washington Monument than to defend the President of the United States? It clearly is not—now, yesterday, or tomorrow.

Relentless, roaring mobs marching through the streets of Washington throwing rocks and flaming bombs were a predictable offshoot of an otherwise peaceful demonstration, but nonetheless one in which the demonstration leadership was unable to control all of the elements that joined it.

Well, things have reached the point where a vast majority of the American people—silent or otherwise—have about had it with mob rule and protesters who offer no constructive alternative other than the wholesale slaughter of millions of South Vietnamese. And God forbid the day that any American President makes that choice at the insistence of churning, chaotic mobs.

I truly believe that the American people have a deep moral commitment to the people of South Vietnam. I respect those who do not agree. I expect them to say so in the same orderly way that I publicly express my views. And I expect them to respect my views as well.

President Nathan Pusey of Harvard has put the entire subject of demonstrations in proper perspective with his comment that the right to dissent does not include the right to force assent.

There is no question in my mind that the majority of Americans support President Nixon. I am equally convinced they will become more and more vocal and then perhaps we can get a clearer view of what the American people really want.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Hawaii (Mrs. MINK).

Mrs. MINK. Mr. Chairman, President Nixon said on November 3 that he believed "that one of the reasons for the deep division about Vietnam is that many Americans have lost confidence in what their Government has told them about our policy." He went on to say:

> The American people cannot and should not be asked to support a policy which involves the overriding issues of war and peace unless they know the truth about that policy.

I wholeheartedly concur with this statement. This House should heed his admonition. It is precisely this reason which has forced me to conclude that it is equally illegitimate to expect this House to support a policy of such magnitude as the life or death of our American men unless we know the whole truth about that policy.

It is pretended that by the November 3 speech the Nixon policy regarding Vietnam became an established fact. Try to walk through its maze.

The President starting by saying that, "The great question is: How can we win America's peace?"

Yet he offered the traditional challenge of why we should continue the war. He said:

> A nation cannot remain great if it betrays its allies and lets down its friends. Our defeat and humiliation in South Vietnam would without question promote recklessness in the councils of those great powers who have not yet abandoned their goals of world conquest.

He said he was opposed to "immediate withdrawal of all American forces." He qualified this later in his speech by saying he was opposed to "the precipitate withdrawal of American forces."

But then he said:

> We have offered the complete withdrawal of all outside forces within one year.

So one concludes that he only opposes precipitate withdrawal, and that 1 year is not precipitate.

He said:

> I choose instead to change American policy on both the negotiating front and the battlefront.

But on the negotiating front he said that no progress whatever in the negotiation "has been made except agreement on the shape of the bargaining table." He stated:

> There can now be no longer any question that progress in negotiations depend only on Hanoi's deciding to negotiate.

He said that he has "put into effect another plan to bring peace—a plan which will bring the war to an end regardless of what happens on the negotiating front."

He described this plan which he called the Nixon Doctrine, and said that—

> When you are trying to assist another nation to defend its freedom, U.S. policy should be to help them fight the war but not fight the war for them.

This is his plan for the battlefront; not peace but more war, waged by the Vietnamese with our arms, our material and our money. He has evidently all but abandoned the negotiating table as futile; and his peace plan called "Vietnamization" only means more war, not peace.

The only remaining consolation is that his plan could mean the return of all American combat forces. He said he has a plan worked out "in cooperation with the South Vietnamese for the complete withdrawal of all U.S. combat ground forces and their replacement by South Vietnamese forces on an orderly scheduled timetable."

He stated that the "rate of withdrawal will depend on developments on three fronts. One—progress which can be, or might be made in the Paris talks, the other two factors—are the level of enemy activity and the progress of the training program of the South Vietnamese forces."

I hope you have all noted that none of these three factors which will determine our rate of withdrawal is in our control. Hanoi could decide this issue by continuing to stall the Paris talks, and by accelerating the level of enemy activity. Or South Vietnam could prevent our early withdrawal by falling down on the training program. I hardly call any of these prospects as positive affirmative action for peace on our part. Withdrawal on this basis is not our policy but someone else's.

The November 3 speech is full of so many contradictions in and of itself without even trying to compare it to the May 14 speech of the President, which others have done to their great consternation.

I take this time to analyze the President's speech because it has been noted as the justification for adopting House Resolution 613. A quick reading of House Resolution 613 will reveal that it contains nothing on the central issues discussed by the President in his November 3 speech as I have outlined.

House Resolution 613 states no new positions taken by President Nixon. It merely restates the Johnson policy in effect since 1966. What function is served to adopt a resolution which is purely historical, without any new steps for peace?

The President is correct when he says that American confidence is harmed when we do not speak the truth. The truth today is that withdrawal, like "stop the bombing of North Vietnam" of a few years ago, is controversial and therefore we are asked to blind ourselves to its reality.

I happen to support the President's offer of complete withdrawal of all outside forces within 1 year. I would vote for House Resolution 613 only if it embodied this principal of withdrawal. Such a resolution would be meaningful and would contribute to the unity which the President wants by confirming our new initiatives for peace. Without facing this truth House Resolution 613 is but an empty gesture and will further exacerbate our lack of specific national goals in our pursuit for peace.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. MELCHER).

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. Chairman, I am the coauthor of House Resolution 684, which is identical with House Resolution 613, and I shall certainly vote for the resolution in seeking a just peace in Vietnam.

I also coauthored House Resolution 568 backing the President on his troop withdrawal policy. If in the future the President should decide to change his policy from withdrawal of our troops and the rapid pursuit of peace, I believe it is mandatory that he should first consult with the Congress so that we may express ourselves with full knowledge of any change in the Vietnam situation justifying an alteration of our course.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT) for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613 and to urge each Member of the House to indicate his support of the President's efforts to bring about a just and honorable peace in Vietnam by voting in favor of this resolution.

Regardless of who is President of the United States or his party affiliation, when he is dealing with foreign nations the country benefits by the strongest possible bipartisan support of his efforts.

As you know, Ambassador Lodge recently announced his resignation as Chief Negotiator with the North Vietnamese and stated that his Government had made every reasonable concession without any agreement except as to the shape of the negotiation table. In my opinion, the North Vietnamese will not make any concession as long as they feel that this Nation is divided and that they can obtain their objective by stubborn refusal to negotiate peace in Vietnam.

President Nixon won renewed respect of the American People, in my opinion, by reasonableness and the frankness of this discussion of the Vietnamese conflict a few weeks ago. In essence, he indicated a willingness of this Nation to continue to attempt to negotiate but, at the same time, having an alternate plan to substitute the South Vietnamese combat soldier for the American soldier and to withdraw our combat forces as early as circumstances would permit.

I do not believe that other nations of the world can expect any more than this. The President has carried out his promise of reducing our troop strength and I understand that we have less troops in Vietnam today than we have had at any time during the last 2 years.

Certainly, I hope that all combat troops can be withdrawn soon but I hesitate for this Congress to suggest to the President when complete withdrawal should take place, and believe it is in the interests of the country to permit latitude for the exercise of judgment by the Commander in Chief based upon circumstances as they develop in Vietnam.

Let us show to the Communist world that America is united in our quest for peace and justice in the world by an overwhelming vote of confidence in the President and his efforts on behalf of the people in the country.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DELLENBACK) for a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Chairman, a careful reading of the provisions of H.R. 613 makes clear that its primary thrust is for peace in Vietnam. Not peace "at any price," but a "just peace." It expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for such a peace. It affirms the support of the House of Representatives for the President of the United States in his efforts to negotiate such a peace. It supports the principle of free elections for the South Vietnamese. These are the heart of this resolution.

This is a short resolution. Like any short comment on a large and complex subject it must be looked at very carefully to see what it does say and what it does not say. I personally feel that we should have added some additional language to cover certain points which are not covered therein and to make certain some points therein which are subject to possible misinterpretation. I voted in favor of an attempt to open the resolution up to amendments which would accomplish those results, but we were unsuccessful. So we must now vote on the resolution as it stands.

This resolution does not say that the House of Representatives gives the President any carte blanche authority in connection with Vietnam. It has been made repeatedly clear during the course of this debate that this resolution does not give to the President any authority of a warmaking nature. This is a peace resolution. There are many other things that this resolution does not say. Some, like the points above, it should not say, and other perhaps it should say. I personally regret that it does not expressly indicate that we approve the President's demonstrated policy of continued deescalation of American involvement. in Vietnam. It should have. But any careful examination of the record shows that the President initiated such a policy almost immediately after taking office and that he is definitely following such a policy, and I am convinced that he is committed to the continuation of such a policy. I read into this resolution's support of the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, a steady continuation of such policy of deescalation of American involvement. So long as that policy is continued and followed, I feel that both this House and the American people will continue to support the President's efforts as he seeks to guide this Nation toward a just and early peace.

Because I am convinced that the clear thrust of this resolution is in the direction of such just and early peace, I intend to support it and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I now yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished minority leader (Mr. GERALD R. FORD).

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Chairman, first I wish to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), who has so ably handled the resolution and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MORGAN), chairman of the committee for their tremendously effective help in making certain that the proposal went through the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the House as a whole.

I want to express to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) my deep appreciation for his initiation on original sponsorship of this resolution.

I believe the action of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Dr. MORGAN, and the able gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), in working on and for this resolution, have exhibited statesmanship of the highest order, I want the RECORD to clearly indicate my appreciation and indebtedness to them for their help and assistance.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to announce what the motion to recommit will be. The motion to recommit will be a proposal to insert new language on page 1 of the resolution, line 7. The added language will be as follows:

> Requests the President to continue to press the Government of North Vietnam to abide by the Geneva Convention of 1949 in the treatment of prisoners of war,

In other words, the resolution would read as follows:

> Resolved, That the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for such a peace, calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith toward the Government of North Vietnam, requests the President to continue to press the Government of North Vietnam to abide by the Geneva Convention of 1949 in the treatment of prisoners of war—

And then it would continue as it was reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The decision as to the author of the motion to recommit will depend upon some uncertainties at the moment, but the author will be either the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS) or the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FULTON).

I personally hope and trust that this motion to recommit will receive the support of the membership as a whole. Certainly all Members do want the President, on our behalf as a country, to press for the North Vietnamese Government to abide by the Geneva Accords of 1949 in reference to the treatment of prisoners of war.

I believe this is a strengthening and beneficial change in the resolution as recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRASER. I want to say to the gentleman that while I support the objectives of the amendment on the recommittal motion, I want to observe again that the real minority in a question of this kind is denied access to the motion to recommit. I am sorry about that. This is another instance of an effort to confine and limit the options of this House in expressing its will on this resolution. I understand what is going on. I have seen it happen on other resolutions and on other bills. I am sorry that this is the procedure that is being followed.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. I am sorry that the gentleman from Minnesota cannot support this motion to recommit. I think it is a very desirable and beneficial change in the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON).

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for 10 seconds?

Mr. STRATTON. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. I just want to correct the misapprehension of the gentleman from Michigan.

I did not say that I was opposed to the motion to recommit. I said that I favored its provisions. I was objecting to the abuse of the rules of the House that denied the right——

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield any further.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a good deal of debate here. I have not listened to it all. But I have been impressed with the fact that most of the debate, at least what I have heard, seems to have been centered around rather technical matters, interpretations of language, and the question as to whether we should or should not have passed the Gulf of Tonkin resolution; the question as to whether we should or should not be in Vietnam; or the rate of the withdrawal of troops and so on. I am a little disturbed that we seem to have lost sight in this debate this afternoon of what is, after all, the fundamental issue that surrounds our commitment in Vietnam, just as it has surrounded other American military and political commitments, that is, the basic struggle between freedom and tyranny in the world.

We may complain as to whether we should be in Vietnam or not and whether we should have fought the war in one way or another. But there is no question, I think, in the mind of anyone that the reason why America is in Vietnam today is because of our commitment to freedom and because of our determination to protect ever a small and a relatively weak country against attack and against an attempt to impose tyranny on it from the outside. This is clearly what our Vietnam commitment is all about. We are not there for any personal gain for ourselves or for our country. This is what America has always done. This has been the record, whether foolishly or otherwise, of our involvement in every war.

Today the basic issues with respect to Vietnam, which is still up in the air, is not an issue of American military strength. It is a matter of American will and determination. No one, not even the Communist leaders, has any doubt about the ability of American arms to achieve any objective that they set out to achieve. But the one thing that is still in doubt in the Communist world is the will and the determination of the American people. The Communists still think that this country does not have the stuff to stay until that objective of freedom is achieved, we are, they say, a "paper tiger."

The other day a number of members of the Committee on Armed Services had the privilege of hearing a personal, first-hand report from Maj. James N. Rowe, who was a captive of the Vietcong for 5 years in the delta area of Vietnam. The one thing that most impressed all of us was the fact that Major Rowe—a remarkable young man with much more intestinal fortitude than I am sure most of us have or ever hope to have—the one thing that impressed us most was when Major Rowe told us that the low point in his captivity came when the Vietcong showed him the statements of leading officials, leading Members of the other body, and leading newspapers around the country, saying that America had no business being in Vietnam and that we ought to get out, lock, stock, and barrel. Those statements, Major Rowe told us really shook his morale. This was the only time he doubted his own convictions. The Communists really believe these dissenters speak for America.

Mr. Chairman, the press of the Nation has played up all of the opposing views to the Vietnam war. We had 250,000 demonstrators in Washington the other day. Two or three pages of the Washington Post and the New York Times were devoted the next day to their activities. But the day before 300 Members of this House, representing an overwhelming majority of the 200 million people of the entire country, had joined in cosponsoring this resolution which is before us today.

And that rather remarkable event got only a very small notice in the Washington Post and none at all in the New York Times, except that the publisher says they did put it in a small box in one edition, but somehow it just was not important enough to get in the edition that came to the Capital of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, what we are being asked to decide this afternoon is whether this country is solidly in support of our Nation's policy in Vietnam, whether on this vital issue we are going to back up our President, whether we are united in this effort to back up the forces who are fighting for the principle of free, self-determination for the people of South Vietnam. The important thing before us here today on this floor is whether this Nation of ours does have the will and the determination to see their commitment through.

It is not a question of technique we are concerned with today. It is not a question of battle strategy. It is simply a question of whether the greatest nation in the world, with the greatest armed forces in the world, also has the necessary intestinal fortitude to back up the President of the United States and to stick with our commitment long enough to achieve peace, not at any price, but peace with justice in Vietnam.

Mr. Chairman, I think we do have that determination and it is my sincere hope that this resolution will receive an overwhelming vote here today as a manifestation of that determination.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my personal gratitude and appreciation to the distinguished gentleman from New York for his ardent endeavors, his advice, counsel, and assistance throughout the time that this question has been under consideration. He has been one of the original and one of the most effective champions of this resolution.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BARRETT).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BARRETT was allowed to speak out of order.)

RETAIN RAY LAPIN AS PRESIDENT OF FNMA

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, about a week ago, I brought to the attention of the House what I considered to be a failure on the part of the administration to heed the expressed mandate of the Congress.

At that time I raised the question as to whether the Federal National Mortgage Association would, as the Committee on Banking and Currency had contemplated, be the first to issue mortgage-backed securities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have an even more blatant case of where the administration has refused to follow the will of Congress.

According to newspaper reports, which I have verified with Fannie Mae, its President will ask the Board of Directors to determine formally that one-third of Fannie Mae's common stock is owned by persons or institutions in the mortgage lending, home building, real estate or related business. This, Mr. Chairman, is the key test which the Congress set out for determining the point when control of the FNMA should pass from the Board of Directors appointed by the President to a new Board elected by the public stockholders. I am delighted that the public, mortgage lenders, builders, and others, have moved so rapidly to acquire the FNMA stock. Their purchase of this stock has been related to their use of FNMA's secondary market facilities, which has been responsible for almost all of the financing of the FHA and VA market, notwithstanding the decline in home building due to the severe credit crunch.

Coupled with this announcement, there now seems to be a powerplay afoot. I am disturbed to learn that the present administration is trying to force the resignation of Ray Lapin, the incumbent president of Fannie Mae. Mr. Chairman, the success of FNMA is due in large part if not entirely to the efforts, actions, and management of Ray Lapin and the respect and confidence he enjoys among all those concerned with homebuilding and financing. We must recognize but for the date included in the statute, the private stockholders could now elect a new Board of Directors and in turn this Board of Directors could elect a president; thus bringing to a close Fannie Mae's so-called transitional period.

Last year when the legislation was before the Banking and Currency Committee, we specifically provided that the president of the Federal National Mortgage Association, during the transitional period, could be removed from that office only for "good cause."

Mr. Chairman, this was done deliberately because the committee and the Congress felt that the transition period of Fannie Mae should be wholly divorced from partisan politics.

Mr. Chairman, we knew then the power the President has to remove from office and by our actions we sought to limit that power.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the present administration's plan is to succeed, the will of the Congress will be subverted. Further, Mr. Speaker, this attempt by the administration to remove Mr. Lapin could very well undermine the confidence presently enjoyed by FNMA and handicap its purpose and function, which is so greatly needed at this time when there is a serious shortage of funds for housing, particularly for low- and moderate-income families which has received the bulk of FNMA assistance.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope and most strongly urge the President to reconsider his letter requesting the resignation of Mr. Lapin.

I submit for the RECORD a statement of Mr. Lapin issued today:

STATEMENT OF RAYMOND H. LAPIN, PRESIDENT OF FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION, DECEMBER 2, 1969

I have today received a letter dated November 26, 1969, from the President of the United States purporting to remove me as president of the Federal National Mortgage Association. The President's letter does not set forth any specific ground for my removal.

The fact is, as representatives of the Administration have now made clear to me, the President wishes to fill my position with a person of his own choosing. I do not intend to bow to this unlawful desire.

My own attorneys have advised me that, as a matter of law, I am removable by the President only "for good cause". That I was not appointed by the Administration is not the kind of "cause" which Congress referred to in 1968 when it sought to establish FNMA's independence from government control. And the Supreme Court of the United States has unequivocally held that the desire of one Administration to replace members of independent bodies with persons of their own choosing is not a valid basis for action.

Moreover, like any other citizen, I am entitled to due process of law. I am entitled, like any other citizen, to written notice of the charges against me, if any, and a fair opportunity to respond to them. The letter from the President affords me neither of these crucial constitutional rights.

Of course, the President would like to put a person of his own choice in my place. Although I have declined to accept the substantial raise in pay which was scheduled for the president of FNMA when the agency became a private corporation wholly owned by its stockholders, my successor would be entitled to receive a salary of at least $85,000. This is the juiciest plum at the President's disposal.

The President may have another, but related, motive for his sudden move. Under the statutory formula, it now appears that the time has come for FNMA's private shareholders to take complete control of the corporation. Under present law, the shareholders could elect a new board, and through them a president, to take office as early as next May. I can understand why the President wishes quickly to place his own man in my job so that he might be able to prepare himself to run for office on a management slate.

Because FNMA has now reached this important milestone, time is running out on the Administration. If they are to control the results of the next shareholders' election, they must move now, and at my expense.

But FNMA is not part of the spoils system, to be plucked by a President at will. In 1968, Congress legislated that FNMA was to become a private corporation, free from control by any Administration. In order to insure this independence, Congress provided job security for the person who was to serve as president until the shareholders could select their own. I can be removed from my office only for good cause, and only in accordance with the procedures mandated by the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution.

Since the President's letter neither reveals good cause for my removal from office nor adheres to the procedural guarantees afforded every American, I shall take every action necessary to vindicate my rights and the purpose of Congress, and have retained private counsel for this purpose. In short, I intend to fight.

During my presidency, FNMA has been responsible for almost all of the financing of the FHA and VA market, notwithstanding the severe credit crunch. In fact, if it had not been for FNMA, the entire FHA/VA market would have been at a complete standstill. While conventional housing starts have declined sharply in the last nine months, FHA and VA-insured housing starts have actually increased thanks to the activity of FNMA. This is particularly significant since the construction supported by FNMA is concentrated in lower and middle income housing.

All of this has been done despite a substantial reduction in FNMA's payroll.

Even the stock market has reflected the high caliber of our performance, tripling the value of an investment in FNMA in just over one year.

Until their decision to obtain my post for another, the Administration was lavish in its praise both for me personally and for FNMA. And well they might, for only through our efforts has it been possible for the Administration to maintain a high level of FHA and VA housing activity, and to keep FHA and VA mortgage rates within reason.

I should note that I have made no secret of my desire eventually to return to private life. But I will not be party to a lawless exercise of raw power, or to the subjection of FNMA to complete control by the Executive Branch. Congress in 1968 provided that FNMA was to be a private corporation, not a patronage pudding. In resisting the President's will, I help carry out that congressional purpose. This is a cause which all men of good will should join.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MORGAN), chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613. I have listened for 2 days now to the debate and the accusations made against the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have here a history of all the close resolutions which have come out of the Foreign Affairs Committee since the 84th Congress, including the Formosa resolution, the Middle East resolution, the Hungarian resolution, the Berlin resolution, the Cuban resolution, the Southeast Asia resolution, and the United Nations resolution. They all came out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs under the same rule under which we are operating today and all with less time. However, I never heard a single word of criticism on any of those resolutions.

Let us take for example the Formosa resolution that was introduced on January 24, 1955. Here was a brandnew Democratic Congress coming in at that time with a Republican President. When he asked for the Formosa resolution, it was introduced on January 24 and referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee. It was reported out the same day. It was taken to the floor of the House the next day and passed in the House of Representatives under the same kind of rule that we are operating under here today.

So, those who have been berating the Committee on Foreign Affairs to death about the lack of hearings in the committee, I just want to say that the committee has operated in the same manner for the last 25 years since I have been a Member.

We did not try to rush this resolution through. The committee was called that morning at 10 o'clock to meet—those mostly who are objecting to the length of time were the ones not there to establish a quorum at 10 o'clock—so as a result we had only an hour and 22 minutes to debate the resolution.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. As I pointed out yesterday, Mr. Chairman, one reason we did not have the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense before the committee was because this is a unique resolution. It was a resolution that was written by Members of the House, and it was not sent up to the House from downtown, so there would have been nothing they could have contributed to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the gentleman for his statement, and that is what I also wish to say.

The Formosa resolution was a House joint resolution that had to pass both Houses of the Congress and then go to the President for his signature.

The Middle East resolution was a House joint resolution.

The Hungarian resolution was a concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

The Berlin resolution was a concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

The Cuban resolution was a Senate joint resolution, and had to pass both Houses and be signed by the President.

The Southeast Asia and Bay of Tonkin resolution was a House joint resolution.

The United Nations resolution was a concurrent resolution.

All we are considering in this measure before us today is just that text of a simple House resolution. It does not give the President any power or authority, nor does it make any commitments. It does not have the force of law as would a joint resolution. It requires neither the consent of nor the approval of the President.

This, however, does not detract from its timely purpose.

Now, there are 170 simple words—and that is all the words that there are in this resolution, just 170 simple words—and they merely affirm the support of the House of Representatives in a most critical period in the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Southeast Asia. That is all it says. It is the House of Representatives hoping that the President can negotiate a just peace in Southeast Asia.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I hope very much to vote for this resolution. Of course, I was one of its cosponsors, but one of the arguments against this resolution has been that this is kind of a blank check, and therefore it does in a sense underwrite future Presidential policy. I would like to have the chairman make this explicit for the legislative history.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I will assure the gentleman from Maryland that if this could be a blank check to escalate the war, that the chairman of the committee, a cosponsor of the resolution, would not be among the sponsors of the resolution.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I thank the gentleman very much for his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MORGAN), 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for the additional time.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Maryland knows, there was an editorial in the distinguished paper from the State of the gentleman from Maryland, the Baltimore Sun, about sense resolutions, not more than 10 days ago. That editorial expressed much of my own views as well as others, about sense resolutions.

Mr. Chairman, however, in view of all these circumstances, I am very much in favor of this resolution. I congratulate the gentleman for giving us his support.

The President's endeavors have, to a very serious extent, been negated by a fallacy which the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong have deluded themselves into believing. Because this delusion is prolonging the war and is a significant factor in blocking genuine, honest peace negotiations by Hanoi, it is essential that we dispel the misunderstanding. This resolution offers the best means of doing it.

The North Vietnamese have been broadcasting by radio, and repeating in Paris, statements by individual Americans, some of them elective officials, purporting to show that we are a nation deeply divided, almost wholly unwilling to continue the effort in Vietnam, with some of us up in arms against our own Government, and virtually on the point of internal political collapse. Of course, we here all know that outspoken dissent is a right inherent in our free and democratic society, but it is so alien to Communist concepts that it is little wonder they deceive themselves into believing in the validity of their wishful acceptance of what we recognize as minority dissent.

We cannot underestimate the seriousness of their misconception, because as long as it leads to their refusal to negotiate and a prolongation of the war, it will add to the cost in American lives. The passage of House Resolution 613 today could result in significant progress toward peace, but if it should only lead to the saving of a single American life, it will be more than worth the time we spend on it.

Over three-fourths of the membership of the House have joined in cosponsoring this resolution affirming support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. Its formal adoption should clinch the evidence convincingly to the North Vietnamese that they are mistaken in their confidence that time and delay will bring about a liquidation of the entire U.S. effort. Our approval will show that our tolerance of protest and dissent does not mitigate or detract from the support of the great majority of the American people for our President's efforts to negotiate a just peace. As strongly and as emphatically as I can, I urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to underscore what the chairman of the committee has said. There is nothing hidden and nothing concealed in this resolution. It simply says what it means, and means what it says. It is an effort to show support for the President of the United States, and hopefully to bring to a just conclusion more quickly than might otherwise be the case in the war in Vietnam.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, the chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania. would acknowledge, I am sure, that in the case of these other resolutions there was testimony taken by the committee before they were reported to the House?

Mr. MORGAN. I remember the gentleman from Minnesota coming on the committee in, I believe it was 1963, so that he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on August 5, 1964, when the Bay of Tonkin resolution was introduced in the House.

On August 6 it was considered in executive session.

Mr. FRASER. But we did hear testimony.

Mr. MORGAN. If the gentleman will let me finish—that morning we had the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State there. We finished the testimony that morning and we discussed the resolution. We voted it out before the committee adjourned and before the House went into session—all in one morning.

Mr. FRASER. I recognize that we had testimony from three different people, from the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs and the testimony of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense.

Mr. MORGAN. Also General Wheeler.

Mr. FRASER. You are right. But I do not know that anybody now advocates the Gulf of Tonkin resolution as an example that this House should follow.

Mr. MORGAN. All I am saying in view of all the criticism and all the argument about procedure here about resolutions coming from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the procedure is no different on this resolution than on previous resolutions.

Mr. FRASER. But we took testimony in those cases.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. The gentleman from Minnesota makes a great fetish of taking testimony, which is absurd and means nothing. We spent as much time on this resolution as we did on the Gulf of Tonkin resolution and we let every member of the committee, including the gentleman from Minnesota, say their piece.

So we had a lot of testimony.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS).

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for passage of House Resolution 613 even though it falls far short of the action which I think the House of Representatives ought to take at this time.

In my opinion the time has come to fix a deadline on the so-called peace negotiations in Paris—a deadline for the representatives of the Government of North Vietnam to sit down and launch meaningful negotiations for peace. If the North Vietnamese failed to meet that deadline then the U.S. Government should make the prompt decision to either fight the war to bring about a military decision or get out of Vietnam—lock, stock, and barrel. The United States cannot fight a war of attrition in Asia nor should American forces be expected to do so.

I want peace as badly as any other citizen of this country. For whatever it is worth I will support this resolution to that end as well as provide a further demonstration of unity in support of the President. But patience is wearing thin. This war cannot be permitted to go on interminably and unless the North Vietnamese quickly demonstrate a willingness to negotiate and a desire for peace, U.S. military forces should be unshackled and given the opportunity for the first time since our involvement in Vietnam to force a decision. As I have previously stated. the alternative is to withdraw.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the time remaining on this side to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. ADAIR) yields 8 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS).

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

One hundred four Members are present, a quorum.

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) is recognized for 15 minutes to close debate.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 613. The resolution is identical to House Resolution 671 which I introduced at about the same time frame as House Resolution 612 and House Resolution 613.

It should be clear to anyone who reads the resolution that its entire purpose is toward peace. I introduced House Resolution 671 because I was convinced that this kind of a resolution expresses the views of the majority of the Members of the House of Representatives and also a substantial majority of the American people.

This resolution deserves the support of every Member of this House because it is in the best tradition of responsible bipartisan congressional support for the foreign policies of the United States. Who can deny that under our Constitution the President is charged with the responsibility of speaking for our country in international situations? As to Southeast Asia, he alone can negotiate peace. On the other hand, if a substantial number of individual Members of Congress should undermine this authority to speak for the Nation, or cause doubts to be raised whether the President speaks for the Nation, then his task becomes much more complex and the goal of a peaceful settlement is made more remote.

After a careful study of the resolution, I became convinced the resolution may not give the President any greater authority that he now possesses. It is a formal expression by the House of Representatives in support of the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. All of us have heard a lot about escalation of the war. Certainly the intention of all of us who introduced identical resolutions was that this effort would result in an escalation of the peace effort.

It is my appraisal that those who argue this resolution could be a blank check to escalate the war are completely wrong. There is nothing hidden here, there is nothing concealed. The resolution says what it means and means what it says. True, it does not have the force of law, but it is a clear expression of the views of the Members of this House.

There are those who say they are concerned that the resolution, by endorsing free elections in South Vietnam, could mean a Communist takeover. Well, the answer to that is that if the elections are truly free and the South should vote communistic, then they will have to suffer themselves under that form of government. But the best answer is that if there are really free elections, there has never been a single instance anywhere in the world that a people who were given the privilege of free elections ever voted themselves under communism.

For those who argue that this resolution is nothing more than a pat on the back for Mr. Nixon, I would caution that we should not fall into the error of regarding this resolution as anything of that kind. I, for one, could not find it possible to vote against this resolution just because it might help Mr. Nixon. If it does help the administration, while at the same time we achieve the goal of honorable peace, then I fail to see how any Member can complain.

All that this resolution says is that the Congress supports the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace. It says that we all want to get the war over with and peace restored in Southeast Asia; and that we are for free elections in South Vietnam and we will abide by the results of such elections. That is what this resolution is all about and that is all there is to it.

If the President fails in his present endeavor there will be time enough for all of us to register our disapproval by one of several means. Certainly we can do so through the appropriation process and even through the authorization process. As I have suggested both on and off the floor, there is always the opportunity to consider again the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

The present occupant of the White House is not of my political persuasion. I did not support his campaign. But a sufficient number of Americans expressed their choice as to Mr. Nixon. I recognize he now has the most difficult job in the world. He is now my President. There is no reason that this resolution should be considered as political. It is my strong belief that the American people are much more knowledgeable than many of those with leftist leanings believe. The people are very competent to figure out whether a move is partisan and political or not. On that point it would seem to me that it would be a political mistake for Members to oppose this resolution. Opposition could very well be construed as an effort to hinder the efforts of the President toward peace with justice in Vietnam.

As I understand the present course of the administration, it is that pending an armistice there shall be no degree of military activity in any measure greater than is necessary to meet the aggression of the enemy. The alternatives would be either full-scale war or peace at any price, which means surrender of our honor and the abandonment to a blood bath of a people who have placed their trust in us. If we support an honorable and just peace in Vietnam, no one is looking to the next election. We are looking to the next generation.

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we have here today a situation that is really a paradox. It is both extremely meaningful and meaningless. For the first time in 5 years the House is considering a resolution concerned with Vietnam. In that sense it is very meaningful. But on the other hand we are dealing with a resolution that is unclear, ambiguous, that is being interpreted by each member in a different way, that has not the force of law and therefore is meaningless.

We have a closed rule, which I opposed, on this resolution and only 4 hours of debate. If we consider Vietnam as important, then that is a disgrace to this body. We have a choice of voting for the resolution or voting against it. A vote for it can be construed in many ways, and a vote against it is equally unclear in intention. There have been speakers, both yesterday and today, who have taken the resolution apart phrase by phrase and have posted the question "what is wrong with that?" or uttered the phrase "who can object to that?" But it is the meaning of the words with which I find fault. Everyone says, and I am sure, believes, that he is for a just peace, but in statements on the floor both yesterday and today, we see that just peace means something different to each man. Everyone is for free elections, but the resolution does not define that phrase. We have seen in the past 2 days that a legislative history is being accumulated. Every man who speaks either tries to define the resolution or explain his interpretation of the resolution. I think this is fair and that it is right—for since there were no hearings held and because the resolution is being ramrodded through the House, there is no legislative history and some must be created at this time.

I greatly fear how this resolution will be interpreted—not so much abroad but here at home. The President, in an unprecedented visit to this body, thanked the Members for their support, through this resolution, of his policies as described on November 3. I do not support that policy. I support the President. I supported the previous President, and yet I did not support his policy. There are two ways to support a President—as an institution, and I do support the Office of the President and the man who now holds that office. But one can also support an individual man in that office by supporting all of his policies. I do not support this President's policies. The President has put a great deal of pressure on the House by interpreting this resolution, which was conceived and written before his speech, as an endorsement of the policies described in that speech. I use the term describe advisedly, for I listened to that speech very carefully. I read it again many times and I do not know what his policy is. He spoke of Vietnamization, he spoke of troop withdrawals, he spoke of negotiations, but I do not know the order in which he places these things. I do not know the priority he gives these things, and I doubt whether many Members of this House would agree on what that policy is and what he says it would be.

This resolution is much too subject to interpretation for my liking. Instead of a simple statement, like that proposed by the gentleman from California (Mr. TUNNEY) supporting the President's efforts for peace, we have many more words. Is agreement through negotiations, on free elections and a just peace, necessary before we withdraw troops? If so, I cannot support this resolution. Are we merely saying we would like a negotiated peace and free elections, but will continue to withdraw our remaining troops? If so, I could support this resolution.

Are the negotiations and free elections preconditions to our withdrawals? If that is the President's policy, I do not support it. I disagreed with President Johnson's policies in Vietnam, but I continued to support him as the President of the United States and I supported his other policies. I disagree with President Nixon's policies on the war because I think they will not work, but I continue to support him as President.

I firmly believe that the pressure of announced gradual troop withdrawals will force the generals in Saigon to broaden their political base and institute reforms as nothing else will.

We have seen yesterday and today many Members who have said they will vote for this resolution, but only after they explain their ideas of it and their explanation of the resolution's intent. If one will only read yesterday's RECORD, he can see that the views differs with each man as does the interpretation of the resolution. I could make a statement of my thoughts of this resolution as a simple support for peace, hope for negotiations and free elections, but not an endorsement of past, present, and future policies. I can describe what I would have preferred in a resolution, that would have urged and supported further troop withdrawals regardless of what happens in the field or in Paris. But I cannot in good conscience vote for this resolution. I support the President's search for peace, but I think his methods are wrong; that he has made and is making a great mistake, that his policies will not lead any more quickly to peace nor the end of hostilities than did the policies of the former administration.

However, I am even more greatly concerned about this resolution, and feel that it is a mistake, because I can see how it will be used by the way it has been used already. The President calls this resolution a support for his policy. Yet even its authors say it is not. The President says it indicates unity behind his program. Yet we all know that it does not. More frightening, however, is the fact that it is being used to squash dissent. Again, read yesterday's RECORD, and we see that many say that those who oppose this resolution do not support the President. Yet this is patently false and misleading. We find those who dissent and criticize these policies are equated with traitors and extremists. Yet we all know of honorable, patriotic, loyal, intelligent Americans that oppose this policy because they believe it is not in the best interest of the United States nor of the American people and that it will not help save American lives.

I am sorry to say that it appears to me that this is just another attempt on the part of the administration and its supporters to make dissent impossible. The Vice President, the President's director of communications, his Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission and others in his administration have called dissent dishonest and unpatriotic, but I consider it the highest form of patriotism to attempt to prevent self-destruction on the part of the country we love. False unity and silence are not approval, although the President chooses to interpret them that way, and dissent is not condemnation although some choose to interpret it that way.

I oppose these policies because I think they will harm America and our people. What I propose is what I believe will be best for the United States and all Americans.

Where do we end up with this resolution? In the beginning of my remarks, I said that this was a rather meaningless resolution and innocuous if it only does what its sponsors say it does.

We all support our President: We all support a just peace: We all support free elections. It would be easy to vote for this resolution, preceded by a statement explaining my position on Vietnam and what I hope this resolution will do and what it will not do.

But—and this is too important a condition to be ignored—if negotiations fail or do not go anyplace, that is if all substantive issues continue to be ignored as they have been until this date, what will happen?

The President has said that if in his opinion the conditions in Vietnam necessitate escalation, he will escalate the war. In that case, I am afraid House Resolution 613 will be a mere repeat of the Tonkin Gulf resolution. I am quite happy to learn from previous mistakes, and I do not choose to repeat them. This resolution can be used just as the Tonkin resolution was used.

That may not be the intention of its sponsors. But the President has already interpreted this resolution as support for his policy as declared on November 3. That policy allows for escalation of the war, a return to previous policy. I did not support it in the past, and certainly will not give my approval in advance.

Mr. PURCELL. Mr. Chairman, once again I would like to express my utmost desire to see this great Nation find peace in Southeast Asia. When the people of South Vietnam are given the opportunity to choose for themselves the direction which their government will take, and the men who will lead them, the United States will have fulfilled its obligation to this beleaguered country.

It is essential that we here today give strength to this quest. It is plain now that so long as the Communists feel they can wait us out, there will be no peace. The adoption of this resolution today should convince them that our disagreements are strictly within the United States' family and not a cause for continued delay by the Communists in negotiating a peace in Vietnam.

I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that our voice must be heard—not just here in this Chamber, but across the world in Paris and Hanoi. The louder that voice, the sooner will North Vietnam accept and recognize our determination to see that South Vietnam dictates her own future.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Chairman, all of us in this House, I am sure, share a desire for early peace in Vietnam.

Whatever our political affiliations, we would like to see the President succeed in making peace on the best possible terms. If he succeeds, we all succeed. If he fails, we all fail.

We can generally applaud the general idea of a negotiated just peace contained in H.R. 613, the Wright resolution. Furthermore, we could have generally applauded many of the Vietnam-related resolutions which came across our desks in the interim between the October 15 and November 15 marches.

Nevertheless, there are aspects of this resolution which are troublesome.

I am troubled less by the resolution's own words than by the administration's seeming eagerness to embrace the resolution as evidence of a sort of open-ended endorsement of the Nixon Vietnam policy. This resolution must be read together with the President's November 3 speech, and I am troubled by a number of statements in that speech.

Let me set forth three particularly troublesome statements:

First. The President said:

> At the time we launched our search for peace, I recognized we might not succeed in bringing an end to the war through negotiation. I, therefore, put into effect another plan to bring peace—a plan which will bring the war to an end regardless of what happens on the negotiating front.

The President's "other plan to bring peace" is not clear, really, since the "Vietnamization" he talks about literally means continuing and prolonging the war without U.S. combat troops but with U.S. support troops backing up the South Vietnamese. We presently have over 400,000 support troops in Vietnam.

The President's speech also tended to downgrade the negotiation front, yet the Wright resolution is devoted almost entirely to approving our negotiation stance.

Second. The President further said:

> The previous Administration policy not only resulted in our assuming the primary responsibility for fighting the war but even more significantly it did not adequately stress the goal of strengthening the South Vietnamese so that they could defend themselves when we left. The Vietnamization Plan was launched following Secretary Laird's visit to Vietnam in March.

The fact is that we assumed the primary responsibility of the fighting for the very obvious reason that in 1965 the South Vietnamese Army was on the verge of collapse. Before, during, and since the 1965 change in roles we have attempted to train, equip, and motivate the South Vietnamese Army. The process is old; only the slogan—Vietnamization—is new.

It is also a fact that President Nixon inherited a situation of deescalation when he assumed the Presidency in January 1969. Under President Johnson the bombing of North Vietnam had ended, at least two North Vietnamese divisions had moved out of the DMZ and the infiltration rates had been reduced. There was already a turning down of the war. Indeed, President Nixon may have wasted time and lives by waiting until August to end search and destroy missions.

Third. The President also said:

I pledged in my campaign for the Presidency to end the war in a way that we could win the peace. I have initiated a plan of action which will enable me to keep that pledge.

The more support I can have from the American people, the sooner that pledge can be redeemed; for the more divided we are at home, the less likely the enemy is to negotiate in Paris.

In recalling his political campaign it seems the President was enraptured by campaign rhetoric. How else to explain the phrase "end the war in a way that we could win the peace." Having forgone the thought of military victory, it is difficult to see how we can "win" the peace either at the bargaining table or by the exclusive use of South Vietnamese troops.

As for division at home, it does exist. While most Americans want an honorable settlement of the war, all Americans are sick and tired of this war. Vietnam is tearing at the social, political, and spiritual fabric of this Nation and no resolution can hide that. While the Mylai incident is, I trust, an isolated example of the worst aspects of war, our national ethic has been damaged, our regard for human life pounded by the brutalization inherent in such a conflict.

The following is from the November issue of the Air Force/Space Digest, which did not endorse the article but noted it was written by "a longtime student of military affairs currently employed in the Department of Defense."

The article said, in part:

In a democratic republic like the United States it has never been possible to unify the country behind a misconceived, controversial, and ill-managed conflict like Vietnam. And let it be added that for too long has the myth persisted that if only this country were united on the war, then the North Vietnamese would immediately begin to negotiate. This does not follow at all—indeed, it never has—and has had a debilitating effect on rational discourse in this country concerning the war.

The higher road of patriotism is to think, to make searching inquiry, to follow one's conscience. The easy way is to respond to the superficial patriotic passion of the moment.

Fourth. Finally, when Vice President AGNEW flew to Montgomery, Ala., a town where the same company owns both newspapers, and attacked the Washington Post and the New York Times, which operate in cities with three competing papers, he used the Wright resolution as a weapon.

He said:

If a theology student in Iowa should get up at a P.T.A. luncheon in Sioux City and attack the President's Vietnam policy, my guess is that you would probably find it reported somewhere the next morning in The New York Times. But when 300 congressmen endorse the President's Vietnam policy, the next morning it is apparently not considered news fit to print. (Emphasis supplied.)

Ironically, the New York Times did print the report in all but one edition, but the more interesting thing is the Vice President's statement that the Congressmen endorsed the President's Vietnam policy. He was referring to the signers of the Wright resolution.

We should be troubled by this, for the Nixon administration is trying to have it both ways. It is playing the tune of national unity on the one hand while turning loose its partisan political gunners on the other. We do not know to what further use this increasingly political administration will put this resolution.

Let us not walk into a trap. While JIM WRIGHT, I am sure, acted out of patriotic and high-minded motives in presenting his resolution, that resolution was booby-trapped during the night.

In our democratic society, asking questions is a vital part of avoiding error. By asking the right questions you can usually arrive at the truth. The Nixon "plan" for ending the war leaves too many questions unanswered.

Finally, I must object to this resolution on procedural grounds.

H.R. 613 comes to the floor under a closed rule, with no amendments permitted. We are told that under the precedents, a closed rule is called for on foreign policy resolutions. However, in the precedents cited, there were committee hearings before the resolutions came to the floor. No hearings whatsoever were held in this case. Aside from this, however, I believe that regardless of the precedents, we should permit amendments on this first House resolution in 5 years dealing with the open wound of Vietnam policy.

I cannot support a resolution, however high minded, which has been interpreted by this administration as a flat endorsement of a policy that is shrouded in uncertainty and vagueness. I am for peace with justice in Vietnam. I am also for the justice of the House of Representatives meeting its responsibilities by searching inquiry rather than mere acceptance.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, today the House of Representatives is going to vote on one of the most important pieces of legislation in its history, House Resolution 613, "Toward Peace with Justice in Vietnam."

First, I think it is fair to say that every single Member of the House is for peace with justice in Vietnam. There is disagreement in the House as to how we can best achieve peace with justice in Vietnam, but the overriding factor is that we are all searching for an honorable peace in Vietnam as soon as humanly possible.

I think it is a fair question to ask those who disagree with our present policies if they have a better alternative. Some possibly do. Some, I am sure, do not.

The author of the resolution, the distinguished Representative from Texas, JIM WRIGHT, is one of my best friends and has gone out of his way to help me since I came to the House in January 1965.

I have discussed the resolution with JIM WRIGHT in depth. He says flatly that the resolution is not an endorsement of the President's speech of November 3.

But on November 13, 1969, the President, in an address to the House, said:

Yesterday I was informed by a bi-partisan group from the House of Representatives that over 300 members of the House had joined in sponsoring a resolution for a just peace in Vietnam along the lines of the proposals that I made in a speech on November 3, 1969.

President Nixon went on to say:

But I do know that when the great issues are involved that in this House, that what happened yesterday with the announcement on the part of Members on both sides of the aisle are well over a majority supporting the policy of the President of the United States, I realized that this was in the great tradition of this country.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. WRIGHT's statement that his resolution is not an endorsement of the President's speech, seems to collide head on with what the President said. I mention this fact because I feel it points out the air of confusion that this resolution seems to have brought about.

Since the introduction of this resolution, I have agonized daily over its possible impact on the House and on the country.

I am for peace with justice in Vietnam. I have supported the President's announced plans of troop withdrawals. But this does not mean that by voting in favor of this amendment I am approving any future course of action which might be taken by the President in regard to Vietnam.

This resolution is anything but perfect and for that reason, I have signed the following statement:

Confusion exists with respect to the meaning and intent of the resolution relating to the Vietnam policy. Introduced on November 4, it was widely reported to be an endorsement of President Nixon's statement of November 3. However, the resolution was drafted and signatures collected prior to November 3.

We regret that no hearings were held on the resolution by the House Foreign Affairs Committee so that some of the confusion and uncertainty could have been resolved.

We hope that during the floor discussion on the resolution its meaning will be clarified. Some of us will decide how our vote will be cast after listening to that discussion.

No matter how we may finally vote, however, we are in agreement on the following:

"We do not endorse everything said by the President in his statement of November 3rd.

"We specifically do not give advance approval of future decisions on Vietnam.

"We affirmatively urge efforts to reduce the level of violence in Vietnam; the broadening of the political base of the Saigon government, and the immediate designation of a high-level replacement for retiring delegate Henry Cabot Lodge.

It is important to look briefly at the history of this resolution before deciding if it is in the best interests of the United States.

The resolution was approved in committee without the benefit of a hearing. It was then brought to the floor under a closed rule prohibiting any of us from suggesting minor amendments.

I do agree that the President deserves strong bipartisan support for his efforts to negotiate peace in Vietnam. But amendments—or at least a hearing on this resolution—would have given all of us the opportunity to decide what we mean by a "just peace" as the wording appears in the resolution. When we talk about free elections in the resolution, do we mean that everyone in South Vietnam should be able to participate, or would certain groups and individuals be barred?

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I want to say that I hope that in the future any such important legislation is first given the benefit of extensive public hearings and that everyone can be very clear on exactly what the intent of the resolution is.

Mr. HAGAN. Mr. Chairman, on November 5 I joined a large number of my colleagues in cosponsoring a House resolution affirming support of the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. This resolution calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures the United States has made in good faith toward the government of North Vietnam and approves the principle of free elections for the people of South Vietnam.

Because of the recent demonstrations here in Washington and in other cities across the country regarding Vietnam, it has not been hard for Hanoi to misconstrue these demonstrations and take encouragement from them in the hope of more concessions and having negotiations in Paris go their way. It is very important that we, here in Congress, take steps to correct this misinterpretation of opinion. We must let it be known that basically there is a strong sense of unity among our people and that the dissent so loudly proclaimed in our news media is not necessarily the majority speaking. We need to impress the leaders in Hanoi with the unity of purpose underlying this resolution. They seem to believe that our country is about to cave in and surrender to the vocal minority that is presently "making the scene," so to speak. They are hoping this will be true and are perfectly willing to sit back and wait it out. In the meantime, the fighting continues and they refuse to honor cease-fire rules or even show interest in reciprocating while negotiations are going on in Paris.

There are two other points worthy of mention today, one is that this is not another "Gulf of Tonkin" resolution and it is clearly distinguishable on at least three counts: One, its thrust is entirely toward peace not war; two, the Tonkin resolution, by inference at least, seemed to broaden presidential powers whereas nothing in this Vietnam resolution would suggest this; three, the Tonkin resolution implies approval for future acts by the executive while today's resolution has reference to actions already taken and positions already on record. This is not an open-ended resolution.

My second point is that while this resolution demonstrates to Hanoi that we are standing together in support of the President's efforts, it also lets Saigon know that we are committed to freedom of self-government for South Vietnam through free and fair elections for all the South Vietnamese people.

I strongly urge passage of this resolution because of the tremendous impact it can have in bringing out a more realistic view of our stand on peace in Vietnam. Who does not want peace in Vietnam in this country and an end to the war? On this we can all agree but let it be known that it must be an honorable and fairly negotiated peace. We will not settle for less.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613, "Toward Peace with Justice in Vietnam." I support President Nixon in his effort to end the Vietnam war. We can have only one President of the United States. I strongly believe he has the willingness and the knowledge to conclude this war expeditiously.

The language of the resolution is clear. It simply "affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam." We are not going to end the war in Vietnam with a divided Nation. This resolution is the best way to show Hanoi that we stand united behind our President. I strongly urge its passage.

Mr. Chairman, I also submit another reason we should pass this resolution by a large vote is that we should remember the most important man of all—our serviceman in Vietnam. The passage of this resolution is going to make his job a lot easier for him.

We are all anxious to end this war as soon as possible. Passing this resolution would be a giant step in the right direction. We should remember this is a peace resolution not a war resolution.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that we sent combat troops to Vietnam in 1965 to prevent an overthrow of the south by the north and to give the elected government of South Vietnam time to build so that it could become strong enough to defend itself from the north or make a political arrangement with the north.

I believe that we have accomplished that objective.

I believe that we did not enter Vietnam to inflict a defeat on North Vietnam but to prevent a defeat of South Vietnam.

I believe that we have accomplished that objective and that we can begin to withdraw our troops, not in a precipitous manner but in an orderly and systematic fashion. This position has been embodied in a resolution which I have cosponsored which provides that American troops should be withdrawn as quickly as possible contingent with the necessity to:

First, provide for the safety of U.S. forces; second, secure the release of American prisoners of war; third, assist any Vietnamese desiring asylum, and fourth, enable the United States to make an orderly disposition of its facilities in South Vietnam.

I believe that this is also President Nixon's policy and if it is, he, of course, has my support.

The difficulty is that I am not sure that this is Mr. Nixon's policy.

During the last year and a half he has made inconsistent statements about Vietnam and, therefore, I am reluctant to give a blanket endorsement of all his policies past, present, and future on Vietnam.

This would not be the first time the Congress was asked to give a blank check on Vietnam.

On August 2 and 4 of 1964 U.S. destroyers on the high seas in the Gulf of Tonkin were apparently attacked by North Vietnamese torpedo boats.

On August 5 the Congress was asked to adopt and on August 7 did adopt a resolution supporting the President of the United States in his determination—

> To take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the forces of the United States and to prevent further aggression.

I do not believe that any Member of this House ever dreamed that that resolution would be used as the legal basis for a force of over 500,000 U.S. ground forces in Vietnam.

We did not realize that we were giving the President of the United States a blank check.

We are being asked to do the same thing today.

There is a saying:

> You fool me once, shame on you, You fool me twice, shame on me.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to vote another Vietnam blank check.

I call this resolution a blank check because I do not understand what it means.

It states that—

> The House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

Which efforts?

During the campaign Mr. Nixon said he had a "plan" for ending the war. He has not revealed that "plan." Does this resolution endorse that secret plan?

On March 4, 1969, Mr. Nixon said:*

> There are no plans to withdraw any troops at this time or in the near future.

On March 14 Mr. Nixon said:*

> There is no prospect for a reduction of American forces in the foreseeable future.

Does this resolution endorse these statements?

On August 25, Ho Chi Minh wrote a letter to Mr. Nixon and concluded with the following paragraph:

> With goodwill on both sides we might arrive at common efforts in view of finding a correct solution of the Vietnamese problem.

On November 3, 1969, Mr. Nixon said that Ho's letter "flatly rejected my initiative."

Does this resolution endorse that interpretation of Ho's letter?

For good and understandable reasons Mr. Nixon refused on November 3 to announce a timetable for withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam.

Does this resolution endorse Mr. Nixon's future rate of troop withdrawal however fast or slow that may be?

In his speech on November 3, Mr. Nixon twice used the words "win the peace."

Does this resolution endorse those words and if so, what do they mean? Does it mean that we will not settle unless the treaty nails the coonskin to the wall?

In his speech on November 3, Nr. Nixon

---

* On March 26, 1969 I introduced with 33 co-sponsors a Resolution which read: "Resolved that it is the sense of Congress that the United States should begin to reduce its military involvement in Vietnam".

warned Hanoi that increased violence might lead to reescalation of the war.

Does this resolution endorse reescalation?

During Secretary of Defense Laird's testimony before the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee on November 17, 1969, two weeks after President Nixon's November 3 speech, the following exchanges took place:

Mr. MAHON. If Vietnamization does not work, and if the North Vietnamese escalate the war, and if agreements cannot be reached in the Paris peace talks or otherwise, do you foresee the possibility of an escalation of the war in Vietnam?

Secretary LAIRD. I would not rule out that possibility completely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MINSHALL. You say you are not ruling out any course of action. You mean by that conventional warfare only or would that also include nuclear weapons?

Secretary LAIRD. I would not anticipate the use of nuclear weapons in Vietnam. I am not, however, ruling out other actions that might be necessary in the event the Vietnamization program does not work, even though I am confident it will work.

Does this resolution endorse that testimony? According to an article by Harrison Salisbury in the New York Times:

Xuan Thuy, North Vietnam's delegate to the peace talks here, contends that Hanoi is and has been ready at any time to meet the United States in private talks aimed at ending the war.

And—

That Mr. Lodge had rejected this proposal, insisting that the only question he was prepared to discuss was that of "mutual withdrawal."

Does this resolution endorse this position?

In his speech on November 3, Mr. Nixon said:

The American people cannot and should not be asked to support a policy which involves the overriding issues of war and peace unless they know the truth about that policy.

I honestly do not know the truth of that policy and, therefore, I cannot vote for a resolution that blindly endorses it.

I could support this resolution if seven words were changed so that the first few lines would read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives urges the President to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Chairman, what is America's Vietnam policy? What are our objectives there? What specifically can be done to achieve those objectives and resolve the conflict?

Everybody in Washington can give a different answer to those questions. It seems to me, so far as official American policy is concerned, the best answers can be found in the words of the President of the United States. Defining what he called "our essential objective in Vietnam," President Nixon has said:

We seek the opportunity for the South Vietnamese people to determine their own political future without outside interference.

We seek bases in Vietnam.

We seek no military ties.

We are willing to agree to neutrality for South Vietnam if that is what the South Vietnamese people freely choose.

We believe there should be an opportunity for full participation in the political life of South Vietnam by all political elements that are prepared to do so without the use of force or intimidation.

We are prepared to accept any government in South Vietnam that results from the free choice of the South Vietnamese people themselves.

We have no intention of imposing any form of government upon the people of South Vietnam, nor will be a party to such coercion.

We have no objection to reunification, if that turns out to be what the people of North Vietnam and the people of South Vietnam want; we ask only that the decision reflect the free choice of the people concerned.

The President has also articulated specific proposals which have the full approval of President Thieu and which he believes to be "consistent with the principles of all parties." Here in his own words are the specific proposals the President has recommended:

As soon as agreement can be reached, all non-South Vietnamese forces would begin withdrawals from South Vietnam.

Over a period of 12 months, by agreed-upon stages, the major portions of all U.S., allied and other non-South Vietnamese forces would be withdrawn. At the end of this 12-month period, the remaining U.S., allied and other non-South Vietnamese forces would be withdrawn. At the end of this 12-month period, the remaining U.S., allied and other non-South Vietnamese forces would move into designated base areas and would not engage in combat operations.

The remaining U.S. and allied forces would complete their withdrawal as the remaining North Vietnamese forces were withdrawn and returned to North Vietnam.

An international supervisory body, acceptable to both sides, would be created for the purpose of verifying withdrawals, and for any other purposes agreed upon between the two sides.

This international supervisory body would begin operating in accordance with an agreed timetable and would participate in arranging supervised cease-fires in Vietnam.

As soon as possible after the international body was functioning, elections would be held under agreed procedures and under the supervision of the international body.

Arrangements would be made for the release of prisoners of war on both sides at the earliest possible time.

All parties would agree to observe the Geneva Accords of 1954 regarding South Vietnam and Cambodia, and the Laos Accords of 1962.

Let me be quite blunt. Our fighting men are not going to be worn down; our mediators are not going to be talked down; and our allies are not going to be let down.

I frequently have letters from constituents who are earnestly and honestly seeking peace but who are critical of the policies and procedures which are being followed. Unfortunately, few of these letters reflect a familiarity with the generous dimensions of the proposals the President has made. Very few offer any specific alternatives.

It is my earnest conviction that a vast majority of the American people support the President's policy for peace in Vietnam. House Resolution 613 gives voice to and documents that fact. It adds nothing to the President's constitutional reservoir of power, and it subtracts nothing from the congressional reservoir of power. It is not a mandate; it is an affirmation. It is not an injunction; it is an endorsement. At this critical juncture in the struggle for peace, it is the least we can do; it is the most we can do.

As a cosponsor of the legislation, I urge the largest possible affirmative vote.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, the conflict in Vietnam is a bitter and tragic one and we must bring it to a speedy end. It has taken a terrible toll in lives and resources and has created a frightening division among Americans.

I am sure few doubt that President Nixon is sincerely following a course of action which he firmly believes to be correct. And as a Member of Congress responsible both to my constituents and to the best interests of the country I believe he deserves our support as he endeavors to fulfill his stated commitment to bring peace.

For this reason only, I joined as one of the original cosponsors of House Resolution 613 when it was first proposed prior to President Nixon's speech to the Nation on November 3. The President, alone under our constitutional system, can speak for the Nation in negotiating peace and it was my hope that our expression of unity and resolve will help in this crucial effort.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, I must clearly state my firm conviction that adoption of this resolution will in no way constitute an absolute endorsement of the President's November 3 statement on Vietnam policy or his still undisclosed plan for peace.

While supporting House Resolution 613, therefore, I also reserve my right to disagree and to criticize specific issues or actions. I was, for example, very disappointed that there was no opportunity for more careful consideration of the resolution and, particularly, the possibility of amending it to express support for the withdrawal of troops at the earliest practicable date. The resolution in fact is one sided, for while it expresses support for negotiating a just peace in Vietnam it is silent about the President's proclaimed policy of troop withdrawal and Vietnamization of the war.

Mr. Chairman, like war, the quest for peace is often tortuous and agonizing, and the kind of peace that will finally come to Vietnam is already a matter of great concern. However, although I have some serious doubts and questions about the President's unspecified plan, I am prepared at this time to give him my support in his expressed efforts to negotiate a just peace and to Vietnamize the war.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, we are engaged today in an exercise in futility, an exercise in fantasy, an exercise in rhetoric, ignoring realities.

With all due respect to the honorable gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), and to all the Members of this House who have signed his resolution, I must disagree with that resolution and its purpose. I believe that it ignores what is happening in Vietnam and what is happening in the United States. In the United States we have a great division over what is happening in Vietnam, and this division cannot be cured by words strung together without meaning. We, of course, support the President when he seeks peace. The question is: Will his plans for peace produce peace? I do not believe they will, and thus I cannot support the principles "enunciated" by the President.

For 8 years we have heard three Presidents speak of their hopes and prayers for peace in Vietnam, yet there is no peace. Mistakes have been compounded on mistakes. President Nixon is repeating those mistakes.

We have 500,000 men in Vietnam. They are there in support of the South Vietnamese Government, a corrupt, and cruel government which would have fallen if we had not sent 500,000 men into Vietnam. Our support of that Government has cost us more than $100 billion and almost 40,000 American lives. It survives only because of our sacrifices. It will fall as soon as we withdraw. The United States joined with South Vietnamese Government in refusing to hold elections there, in defying the Geneva accords. President Eisenhower was honest enough to admit the reason. The South Vietnamese Government would have lost the election. I would wish that we could be wise enough to admit what would happen if free elections were held tomorrow in South Vietnam. The South Vietnamese Government would lose that election. As a matter of fact, the present South Vietnamese Government would not allow free elections in Vietnam. It must fall before such elections can be held.

The record of the governments of South Vietnam, our creature-governments, is clear. They are corrupt, and they are not supported by the people of South Vietnam. In the area of corruption, I would like to quote the distinguished Senator from Georgia, HERMAN E. TALMADGE:

> The Department of State concedes that there is corruption in Vietnam, but gives no indication of its extent or cost to the taxpayers, or to the war effort. It holds out no real hope for doing anything about it.

The State Department on June 1, 1968, said:

> The United States recognizes that there is corruption in Vietnam, and we are pressing in every way that we can to help the South Vietnamese find ways to deal with it . . . Much greater results are needed if the problem of corruption is to be resolved.

We know the cost in American lives in Vietnam, but we do not know the cost of corruption both in lives and in dollars.

William Lederer in his book "Our Own Worst Enemy," quoted a North Vietnamese officer as saying:

> Without American money, guns, food, medicine and supplies, we of the National Liberation Front would have a hard time surviving.

Where did the North Vietnamese obtain American money, guns, food, medicine, and supplies? They obtained them from corrupt South Vietnamese officers and government officials.

Conditions in South Vietnam have not changed. On July 7, 1969, Robert G. Kaiser reported in the Washington Post:

> Not long ago the Vietnamese maid of a Frenchman living in Saigon heard that her son, a South Vietnamese soldier had been wounded and was in a Saigon hospital. She tried to find him, but the authorities at each hospital she visited would not tell her if they had the boy as a patient.
> They all demanded a bribe to answer the question, and the woman could not afford to pay.

And so the South Vietnamese Government tries to win the minds and hearts of its people.

The same report points out that a pro-Thieu bloc in the National Assembly's lower house was created by paying each Congressman, $2,500.

We know of the money stolen by past Saigon regimes, of the French banks bought with American funds, of the parties, the girls and the estates. We know that American dollars are going into Swiss banks to care for South Vietnamese politicians who realistically know their days are numbered in Vietnam. The United States will not have to care for most South Vietnamese politicians who would flee a new government. They have already taken care of themselves, at our expense.

How much has corruption cost the United States? It cannot be estimated, but it at least equals $1,000 for every American life lost in Vietnam—40,000 lives, $40 million.

Corruption is not the only failure of the South Vietnamese Government. We say we are fighting for freedom in South Vietnam. Is South Vietnam free? A man may run against the present regime, but when he loses, where does he go? He is jailed. There is no viable government in South Vietnam, because the present government rules through force, American force. It cannot stand by itself, because the Vietnamese people do not support it.

The realities in Vietnam, realities not recognized in this resolution, are:

First. The war will continue as long as American troops remain in South Vietnam;

Second. The South Vietnamese Government is a corrupt dictatorship.

Third. U.S. forces, despite our use of massive military force, have not "won" the Vietnam war and cannot win it.

Fourth. Until the United States recognizes and acts on these realities, there cannot be any hope of peace in Vietnam.

Vietnamization of the war is a sham. The President's "plan for peace" will not work.

Therefore, I oppose this resolution, because it is not a solution to the problem, but it is part of the problem. I support the President's hopes and prayers for peace. I do not support the President's present course in Vietnam, because it will not lead to peace.

On November 13, 28 Members of Congress, myself included, offered a resolution which does recognize the realities of Vietnam. It read:

The resolution calls for withdrawal of U.S. forces in South Vietnam on an orderly and fixed schedule—neither precipitate nor contingent on factors beyond U.S. control—to extend only over a period of time as would be necessary to provide for the safety of U.S. forces, secure the release of American prisoners of war, assist any Vietnamese desiring asylum, and enable the United States to make an orderly disposition of its facilities in South Vietnam.

I urge that this House support this resolution or a similar one. I urge this House to act in a constructive manner, to take action which will produce results, and to respond to what is happening. The challenge today is not to support a wrong course, but to change that course.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613 which says very clearly that the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives support President Nixon in his efforts to bring the Vietnam war to an honorable and just conclusion. Since this body represents the American people more closely than any other elected group, I feel this resolution will dispel any misconceptions that the people of other countries might have about America not being a united people. We are united and we do want peace in Southeast Asia. But in expressing our support for peace, we are also expressing our firm desire that the people of South Vietnam will be allowed to choose their leaders in free and democratic elections. I would urge all of my colleagues to give a vote of approval for House Resolution 613.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the effect of passage of this resolution will not end the war one minute earlier. It may in fact prolong it.

For 11 months the President of the United States has been able to carry on foreign policy affecting, among other areas, Vietnam.

It was felt, I believe justifiably, that an appropriate period of time should be given to the incoming administration to work out their expressed policy aims of concluding the war in Vietnam.

But the President's November 3 speech, which the resolution now before the House endorses, contained no new delineations of policy, contained no series of proposals which would be the basis for total American disengagement, and was notably lacking in specifics regarding American intentions in South Vietnam. It was a speech barren of policy worth endorsing.

The resolution which does endorse this major policy statement by the President on the most critical issue facing our Nation today, comes before this body under unusual circumstances. The House has not been afforded the means to participate in public hearings on the resolution before the Foreign Affairs Committee. Nor has the House been offered the opportunity to amend the resolution on the floor. In sum, the House has been asked to endorse unequivocably the administration's foreign policy on Vietnam and the customary channels of open debate, of free deliberation, of weighing diverse views, have been abruptly curtailed.

The choice therefore before this body is either yes or no, up or down, and while the administration is the architect of our foreign policy the Congress of the United States has a major responsibility in expressing its position.

Though the parallels are not entirely similar, I think reference must be made to earlier congressional action involving this same area of the world. I refer chiefly to the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

For my part I have no desire—however laudatory the expressed purpose, however innocent the choice of language, however sincere the intentions—to participate by giving my formal endorsement of the war aims of the President as set forth in his November 3 speech.

I believe that to join with others in Congress in endorsing this policy as it has been defined will not and cannot result in shortening the war.

The apparent intent of the resolution is to present to the world a facade of unity. But you cannot make what is false true by congressional resolution.

The apparent hope of the resolution is to reduce to simple terms the complexities of our Vietnam policies. But such a broadly worded resolution recalls too clearly the innocuous language of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution and reminds us of the dangers inherent when congressional authority is used by a President for aims not originally conceived.

The apparent design of the resolution is to give painless approbation to our Vietnam policy. But no congressional resolution can, despite studied effort, conceal the staggering dilemma faced by Americans viewing the horror of Mylai.

Support for this resolution will only continue the freeze of attitudes on the part of the National Liberation Front, the North Vietnamese, and, their allies, will result in increased cynicism and increased criticism of U.S. foreign policy by the rest of the world, and will result most importantly, in a heightening of the divisiveness, the frustration and the anger which already besets the Nation.

To join therefore in support of this resolution so disarmingly entitled "Peace With Justice," would serve no useful purpose but would, to the contrary, contribute to an entirely unjustified feeling of comfort which suggests the American Nation is satisfied with the conduct of American policy in Vietnam.

Accordingly I will vote against the resolution.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to strongly support House Resolution 613, a resolution that I am hopeful will better enable the President to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

It seems to me, and it has been eloquently stated by many Members of this body, that the main point of this resolution is to make sure Hanoi understands the simple fact the people of South Vietnam have a right to a government of their own choosing.

I think the President has made it abundantly clear that our Nation is now in Vietnam with one basic, limited purpose—to protect the right of self-government for the people of South Vietnam. I am extremely hopeful that through this resolution the government of Hanoi, which came to power through violence, terror, and military might, will clearly understand this fundamental American conviction. Once Hanoi clearly understands this point, I think we can expect to see real progress in the President's efforts to achieve a just peace.

Mr. SHRIVER. Mr. Chairman, as one of the original sponsors of this resolution I rise to urge its adoption. It is a resolution which has strong bipartisan support. The entire thrust of this resolution is in the direction of peace. The statement rattles no sabers. It makes no threats. It is positive in tone and conciliatory rather than belligerent.

This resolution confers no secret powers upon the President. Under our Constitution, the President is charged with the responsibility for speaking for the Nation in critical international situations. His is the responsibility to conduct negotiations in the name of this country. He alone can negotiate peace.

Since becoming President last January, Richard Nixon has worked to bring an end to the war in Vietnam through negotiations with the other side in Paris. Under his leadership, we have seen American troops returning from Vietnam. The program of Vietnamization is working, and I personally hope the President will soon announce further planned troop withdrawals.

The adoption of this resolution at this time can be helpful to the President as he attempts to end the war with justice and honor. It will tell the Government of North Vietnam and the Vietcong that the membership of the U.S. House of Representatives is closely united with the President in his efforts to negotiate peace.

Unity, understanding, and support for the President and our servicemen in Vietnam will contribute to the success of the Nixon plan for peace. We can help deliver a message to Hanoi that will tell the Communists that now is the time to sit down at the bargaining table and negotiate an end to this war. This is the message which this resolution will carry. I urge its passage.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Chairman, when I agreed to cosponsor the resolution before us today, I did so in the belief that President Nixon and his administration were committed to peace and the disengagement of the United States from its involvement in the Vietnam war.

The President's speech of November 3 emphasized his commitment to peace. He said:

> I pledged in my campaign for the Presidency to end the war in a way that we could win the peace. I have initiated a plan of action which will enable me to keep that pledge.
> The more support I can have from the American people, the sooner that pledge can be redeemed.

Mr. Chairman, for more than 2 years I have urged a systematic withdrawal of U.S. troops from Vietnam at a pace that would get us out of Vietnam as rapidly as reasonably possible. This appeared to be the basic message of President Nixon's speech and the fundamental policy of his administration. I was thus prepared to extend my support for what seemed to be a real effort to achieve an early peace.

Nevertheless, I had misgivings. The President's failure to spell out the details of his Vietnam peace plan disturbed me. He said the administration has adopted a plan for the complete withdrawal of all U.S. ground combat forces and their replacement by South Vietnamese forces. But he declined to announce this timetable.

This omission, I felt, would have several negative effects. It would most likely weaken the incentive for the South Vietnamese to accept their full responsibility in the defense of their country and the determination of their future economic and political structure.

Second, this failure to commit ourselves publicly to a withdrawal timetable leaves the door wide open to a renewed buildup of U.S. forces. Indeed, the President qualified his peace plan by saying it hinged on the level of enemy activity as well as the progress of the training program of the South Vietnamese forces.

The resolution itself is also somewhat ambiguous. It affirms the House's support "for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam." No mention is made of disengagement or withdrawal on any timetable, public or private.

The simplicity of the resolution is appealing in its expressed desire for peace. But this simplicity also gives rise to the dangers of misinterpretation. The 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution was also a simply stated document that gave basic support to a President's policy. Little did the Congress realize how this resolution would be used by President Johnson as legal justification for the massive escalation of American involvement in Vietnam that followed.

My doubts were deepened when this resolution came before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. I had anticipated a public debate during hearings that would allow the administration an opportunity to fill in the blanks of its peace plan. The quiet and precipitate treatment of the resolution by the committee was hardly reassuring, and I thus voted with the minority of my colleagues against a closed rule that shut off debate on the House floor.

Nevertheless, until today I have remained ready to vote for the resolution, believing that President Nixon's search for a just peace was predicated on an irreversible disengagement from the war. This, in my judgment, must be the essence of our Vietnam policy if we are to find peace.

Thus I was shocked to learn today that the administration may not be committed to irreversible withdrawal. In testimony before a House Appropriations Subcommittee released yesterday, Defense Secretary Melvin Laird says that he would "not rule out" the possibility of reescalation of the Vietnam war if the President's policy of Vietnamization does not "lead the way to a military victory."

Secretary Laird's statements place a new interpretation on our Vietnam policy. The emphasis shifts back from a determination to win a just peace to the old game of American willingness in Vietnam to keep all the options open. It is now virtually impossible to believe that the administration is committed to a policy of irreversible withdrawal.

If it is not, it would appear that this resolution can be used to sanction any kind of Presidential policy change in Vietnam, including a new escalation of fighting.

In this light, the resolution takes on the same dangerous coloring as the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I cannot and will not support a resolution that would condone, and perhaps be used to justify, an expanded American combat effort in Vietnam. Until the administration makes completely clear its intention to withdraw irreversibly from Vietnam, I must withhold my support of its policies, and vote against this resolution today.

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the House of Representatives is acting with undue haste in approving House Resolution 613.

There are unresolved serious doubts about some sections of the resolution. Some of us believe it contains details which could commit the United States of America to an indefinite continuation of the undeclared war in Vietnam with the power of decision resting in only one person—the President.

We who feel this way thought we might be afforded the opportunity of amending the resolution to remove or correct such sections, but we could not even try because of the procedures under which it was debated and voted upon. There were no committee hearings and the resolution was taken up in the House under the obnoxious closed rule.

We may well have given another President another blank check.

It should be evident to everyone that all thinking Americans want military operations and confrontations brought to an end in Vietnam as rapidly as possible—overnight if it were possible.

We, as Members of the House of Representatives, should be in the forefront of efforts to bring an end to the killing and maiming in Vietnam, but are we?

We all know that we are not.

The passage of House Resolution 613 does not place us in such a position. In fact, it drives us further away from the actions that result in the decisionmaking of the President.

If House Resolution 613, which we consider under the muzzle of a closed rule, does give another blank check to the Chief Executive then it is apparent we have not learned. We know what earlier blank checks brought about. The Gulf of Tonkin resolution of 1964 is cited as one example. Such resolutions are in effect a circumventing of the Constitution.

We all support the President's efforts to bring an honorable end and, I hope, a lasting peace to Vietnam and its surrounding areas, but I could not in good conscience vote to give him a blank check. To have done so would not have been in accordance with my beliefs of a democratic form of government or my responsibilities to the people I represent.

The President actively seeks our support for his efforts. I repeat, I give it to him but not by voting for the questionable resolution that was brought before us.

But I do believe that the President owes something in return to Members of the House of Representatives and the people they represent.

First, I believe that he must explain to all what happened to his 1968 New Hampshire announced but unexplained plan for ending the undeclared war in Vietnam. He held out high hopes for all of us.

What was the plan? What happened to it? The public has a right to know. The President's failure to explain this promise or utterance has disturbed me for many months. I was just as disturbed about being asked to blindly vote for House Resolution 613.

It is not clear what the administration is doing about the Vietnam situation except that it is slowly withdrawing American troops. That is important and good, but it is not enough. I expect and hope that there is much more of a constructive nature than can be done, but how many Members know what is exactly taking place. We should not play the game of blindly following the leader.

It is my humble opinion that the President should place all of the facts in the Vietnam situation before us. He could appear before a joint session of Congress to set forth all of the facts and problems. If necessary it could be an executive or closed session. He could permit a stated number of questions to be asked of him. He might keep us apprised of developments by appearing before a joint session every 30 days. Through such a procedure, he would be helpful to us and we might be helpful to him.

It is my hope that the leadership on both sides of the House will extend an invitation to the President to appear before us for a series of in-depth discussions of the Vietnam situation.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, the issue with which we are confronted today is whether the House of Representatives should endorse the Vietnam peace plan submitted by President Nixon.

Up to the present time, the only plan for peace submitted by the President was in his speech to the Nation on November 3—and the secret plan for peace which he discussed in the presidential elections of last year. The only other clue to the plan of the President includes his proposal for Vietnamization of the war.

Like the fable of the emperor's clothes, there appears to be no plan to end the war. The withdrawal of some troops may increase the relationship of combatant to noncombatant forces and result in increased combat forces. The Vietnamization of the war is nothing new. I thought it was the American goal when the first technicians and military advisers were sent to Vietnam in 1964. Vietnamization of the war was American policy when we had 15,000 advisers in Vietnam. Vietnamization of the war is the slow, cruel process which has taken a toll of 44,000 lives and 106.9 billion taxpayer dollars. How much more will Vietnamization of the war cost in lives? How much more in American spirit? How much more will it sap from American morale? How much more in taxpayer expenditures?

The resolution before us authorizes the President to proceed for a "just peace" in Vietnam. The definition of either of these terms is not made in the resolution, nor can it be found in the legislative history. Therefore the term "just peace" can mean whatever the executive decides it should mean at the time it may serve his purpose. The resolution does not preclude escalation, temporary or permanent.

The resolution does not preclude an increased commitment of men or materiel if this should be necessary to obtain a "just peace." The resolution does not prohibit a resumption of a bombing of the north or the use of nuclear weapons if this is necessary to obtain a "just peace." The resolution does not require any further troop withdrawals or prohibit further exposure of American troops if they are needed to obtain a "just peace." The resolution, therefore, authorizes any further commitment of men, materiel and casualties which the executive may deem necessary to win a "just peace."

Then, further—for whom must peace be just—for those who presently control the government of South Vietnam, the people of South Vietnam, the Liberation Front, the Vietcong, the North Vietnamese, the American people, or the citizens of the remainder of the world. Is America to be a separate party to the peace—or is the peace to be achieved in conjunction with the present South Vietnamese government? Is it possible for the United States to achieve peace terms with the present government of Saigon?

Will the conditions for a "just peace" include concessions for American capital and enterprise to be invested in Vietnam? Will the conditions for a "just peace" insure the integrity of American property rights in Vietnam? Is this why 44,000 lives were spent?

Will a "just peace" demand conditions of a better life for those who are left to live in South Vietnam? Will a "just peace" insure land reform and protect the people from exploitation by either the central government or the military strong men who are left in control of military power and property? Will a "just peace" provide for a redemption of the people and the land for a pursuit of a decent, acceptable life for the Vietnamese?

It is incredible to expect that a "just peace" can be achieved for all the parties to the conflict. What is "just" to one—will be of necessity "unjust" to the other. The attainment of a "just peace" could be interpreted to mean through victory by an overwhelming and conclusive defeat of the enemy. Does the President's proposal—whatever it is—contemplate less than a full and complete military settlement of the conflict?

The resolution further supports the doctrine of free elections to determine the future Government of South Vietnam. Can America enforce this commitment on a government presently in control in Vietnam which it recognizes as the lawful Government of South Vietnam? Is this offer to the enemy enforceable? Can we force a free election upon South Vietnam short of making a military enemy of the present government we sought to befriend?

And who will set the rules of the free election? What will be the qualifications of electors? Will the residency requirements permit those who immigrated to South Vietnam to vote on proof of residency after 1, 3, 5, or 10 years? Will former South Vietnamese residents who migrated to North Vietnam be permitted to return and cast their ballots? Who will determine the difference between citizen and intruder?

The resolution before us today leaves these questions and many others without answers. In the orderly course of legislative events, interrogation of government witnesses would have provided a legislative history which would have included the administration's policy with respect to these questions and others that may be deemed important. A resolution which is adopted without this kind of clarification provides the administration with authority to do anything which it chooses within the framework of the words of the resolution.

The adoption of this undefined resolution will allow the creation of a false impression that these Vietnam policies have the overwhelming and unqualified approval of the American people. This resolution could be a disservice to the American people who are entitled to be better informed of the administration's intentions with respect to Vietnam. The patience of the American people has been temporarily extended but it has been stretched thin. The American desire is for an end to the killing and a disengagement from the conflict.

This resolution is designed to meet a confrontation with dissent in America on the continuation of the war in Vietnam. Words, however artful, cannot substitute for the deeds and actions which can bring peace. The semantics of peace which could endorse a prolongation of the war are not acceptable.

This resolution could be easily made acceptable if it were to specify a program for peace and disengagement. In its present form, it is a blank check which could be construed to mean peace through more war. I cannot in good conscience endorse such a resolution.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, many Members have expressed their concern about the interpretation which has been placed on House Resolution 613. This concern has been more formally set forth in a statement signed by 82 Members. The statement with the names of the signers follows:

STATEMENT ON HOUSE RESOLUTION 613

Confusion exists with respect to the meaning and intent of H. Res. 613 relating to Vietnam policy. Introduced on November 4th, it was widely reported to be an endorsement of President Nixon's statement on November 3rd and was so construed by the President when he visited the House. However, the resolution was drafted and signatures collected prior to November 3rd.

We regret that no hearings were held on the resolution by the House Foreign Affairs Committee so that some of the confusion and uncertainty could have been resolved.

We hope that during the floor discussion on the resolution its meaning will be clarified. Among us are sponsors of the resolution. Some of us will decide how our vote will be cast after listening to that discussion.

No matter how we may finally vote, however, we are in agreement on the following:

We do not endorse everything said by the President in his statement of November 3rd.

We specifically do not give advance approval of future decisions on Vietnam.

We affirmatively urge efforts to reduce the level of violence in Vietnam, the broadening of the political base of the Saigon government, and the immediate designation of a high-level replacement for retiring delegate Henry Cabot Lodge.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I will support House Resolution 613 with my vote today. However, I am disappointed that the form of the resolution and the closed rule make it difficult for the House to give full expression to its views on this complex issue. I therefore want to take this opportunity to detail my views on the war in Vietnam more specifically than the broad outlines of the resolution allow.

Since taking office, I have had as a major concern our disengagement from Vietnam. You may recall that in July of 1967 I proposed, along with eight of my colleagues a plan for a mutual disengagement of the war and of the bombing that was underway at that time. The essence of that proposal was gradual, reciprocal, identifiable disengagement of hostilities and of the establishment of a government in which the people of South Vietnam realize true self determination. I believe the most important factor of our proposals was the flexibility which it allowed for both sides. The lack of this flexibility in many current proposals which set public deadlines is their major weakness.

While I believe that President Nixon has made significant progress toward disengagement in Vietnam, I feel that he should accelerate the rate of withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam, investigate the feasibility of a deescalatory unilateral cease-fire, and assist in bringing a more responsive and representative government to South Vietnam.

To argue that the President has not changed the posture of the U.S. in South Vietnam is without logic or fact and weakens the cause of those who argue for further disengagement. To gain perspective, it is interesting to reexamine what the "peace" candidate for President, EUGENE MCCARTHY, was proposing as a means to get out of Vietnam 1 year ago—and the similarity of his proposals to the action which the President has undertaken.

1. Stop the bombing and seek negotiations. 2. Halt the escalation and freeze troop strength. 3. Cease 'search and destroy' missions. 4. Cease attempts to uproot the Viet Cong from areas they have controlled for many years. 5. Conduct a gradual disengagement in the South and a cease-fire on a trial basis in some areas while pressing for negotiation. 6. Insist that the South Vietnamese take on greater military responsibilities. 7. Reexamine military policy. 8. Press the authorities in Saigon to broaden their own political base. (Congressional Record, March 26, 1968.)

One who analytically reviews the steps taken by the current administration in the light of these suggestions will admit that significant progress has been made toward disengagement. This administration does not insist, as did its predecessor, that the result of free elections be favorable to the United States. This Administration has forced the South Vietnamese government to publicly agree to NLF political participation in a coalition supervisory election commission. Our orders are no longer for "maximum pressure" but for "protective reaction." Troops are no longer being increased, but are being brought home.

As Senator FULBRIGHT has said:

I am opposed to an unconditional American withdrawal from South Vietnam because such action would betray our obligation to people we have promised to defend, because it would weaken or destroy the credibility of American guarantees to other countries, and because such a withdrawal would encourage the view in Peiping and elsewhere that guerrilla wars supported from outside are a relatively safe and inexpensive way of expanding communist power.

Nonetheless, I believe that major additional efforts must be made. Specifically, I have recommended that we immediately announce new combat troop reductions as a further indication, both to the North Vietnamese and to the world, that we are sincere in our efforts to disengage from the war. We should also take the initiative in a unilateral cease fire.

Even more important is overt action on our part to meet our commitment to full self-determination for the South Vietnamese. Our goals, as stated by the President in his May 14 speech, are laudatory:

We seek no bases in Vietnam. We insist on no military ties. We are willing to agree to neutrality if that is what the South Vietnamese people freely choose. We believe there should be an opportunity for full participation in the political life of South Vietnam for all political elements that are prepared to do so without the use of force or intimidation. We are prepared to accept any government in South Vietnam that results from the free choice of the South Vietnamese people themselves.

Unfortunately, we have seemed to veer from this commitment through indications of continued support for the Thieu-Ky government. It is imperative that we press the government in the South, in every way possible, to broaden the political participation of opposition groups in the nation, and make the government more representative. Our commitment must not be to the present government, but to a government based on the free choice of all the people. I will continue to express my displeasure with our failures in this area and urge prompt action to correct them. It is vital that we make absolutely clear our commitment for self-determination is not to the Thieu government but to the people as a whole.

Coupled with our insistence on self-determination must come a commitment for the rebuilding of Vietnam both socially and economically. The human havoc which war has wrought on this nation must be repaired—preferably through an international organization where the aid can be free of corruption or hint of political pressure.

There is one other major aspect which I believe needs to be emphasized—a complete prisoner exchange by the two parties. It behooves those who speak out and demonstrate for peace in the name of humanity, also to express openly their concern about prisoners held by both sides. The peace movement would be greatly enhanced if it would directly and overtly encourage the Vietcong and North Vietnamese at least to release the names of prisoners they hold and allow for exchange of mail and inspection by the International Red Cross, as provided for in the Geneva agreements.

The essence of democracy is the right of dissent and the necessity for dialogue among those who dissent and those in a position of power and responsibility. I respect the right of petition to the government and to elected officials and have therefore taken every effort to talk with people from my district who are concerned about the war on every side of the issue.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, the debate and vote this week on House Resolution 613 is a frustrating and disappointing experience for me. For 5 years, the House of Representatives—the part of our Government designed to be closest to the people—has almost completely failed to debate or to endeavor to influence the central event of our times: the war in Vietnam. Now, when we finally undertake such debate, we are forced to conduct it under circumstances which make a near mockery of the whole proceedings. Debate is under a closed rule, with even the most minor amendments being out of order, including some which might clarify the ambiguous, vague wording of the resolution.

In addition, House Resolution 613 at best deals only with the peripheral aspects of the Vietnam problem and fails to come to grips with the basic issues. Couched in pious generalities, it is concerned only with negotiated peace, which today is the least likely avenue for ending the war. The President himself places little reliance on the negotiations as a viable way of halting the war. And I doubt that Hanoi's intransigent position in the Paris peace negotiations will be changed one iota by this resolution.

House Resolution 613 does not take up the most vital decision which the President has made concerning the Vietnam war—his secret plan for troop withdrawals. Nor does it consider any other military issues involved in the war.

For these reasons I voted yesterday against the closed rule. By its vote yesterday, the House of Representatives has almost abdicated its right and its obligation to submit the Administration's Vietnam policy to a hard scrutiny and to offer policy alternatives.

Now I am faced with a yes or no vote on the passage of House Resolution 613, when neither vote really reflects my feelings. I share in part many of the apprehensions expressed by some of my colleagues yesterday. My vote for the resolution may possibly be interpreted as:

First, advance approval of future escalation of the war if Hanoi resumes its offensive, as the President has warned he might do in his November 3 speech;

Second, complete approval of the President's policy in Vietnam and support of every aspect of his November 3 speech, which mentioned a plan for peace completely unknown to us.

If we say "yes" to House Resolution 613, this vote may be interpreted by the administration, the press and the American people as support of the President's timetable for withdrawing troops, no matter how drawn out a procedure that turns out to be.

Third, support for the present Saigon Government which definitely does not represent the people of South Vietnam and which has in the past thwarted our attempts at meaningful negotiations in Paris.

I have good reasons for feeling uneasy about approving this measure. Five years ago I voted for the Gulf of Tonkin resolution and subsequently found that it was greatly distorted by the Johnson administration to suit its own purposes. So I am definitely apprehensive about what the results of this similar resolution will turn out to be.

On the other hand, a vote against the resolution is almost equally misleading as to my position:

First. This vote would make me appear to be opposed to a "just peace," although the record clearly shows that I have been fighting for peace in Vietnam, long before it was fashionable or politically popular to do so.

Second. It would suggest that I do not support the President in a difficult time. This suggestion could not be further from the truth. I applaud and support the President's first steps toward extricating us from this horrible mistake in Vietnam. While I have some misgivings about several aspects of his policy, I am sure that he is doing what he thinks is best in trying to end the conflict. Thus, though I do support his efforts, I think I should have the option to reserve judgment on any of the President's actions in Vietnam.

For all these reasons, the decision on this vote is not easy. But I have reluctantly concluded that I should vote for passage. In doing so I rely heavily on the repeated assurances of the sponsors of House Resolution 613 that approval of the resolution is to be taken as agreement only on the literal meaning of the words used. I do not object to—surely no one can object to—the actual wording of the resolution which is as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for such a peace, calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith toward the Government of North Vietnam, approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body, and that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections, and supports the President in his call upon the Government of North Vietnam to announce its willingness to honor such elections and to abide by such results and to allow the issues in controversy to be peacefully so resolved in order that the war may be ended and peace may be restored at last in Southeast Asia.

Let me at the same time make clear what I am not saying by my affirmative vote. I am not voting for:

Any open-ended blank check endorsing any action which the President may take regarding Vietnam;

Escalation of the war, in retaliation to a new offensive by Hanoi; and Blanket support of the present Saigon government or giving that government veto power over our actions.

One strong consideration in my decision is the distinction made by its main author, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) between House Resolution 613 and the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. His letter to Representative BROCK ADAMS, which was printed in the December 1 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 36085, pointed out three differences. He said this resolution is oriented toward peace, not war as was the Tonkin resolution. According to Mr. WRIGHT, House Resolution 613 is also different in that it neither broadens Presidential powers nor implies approval for future decisions by the President.

As I interpret the ambiguities of the resolution, House Resolution 613 emphasizes the importance of making peace and the right of all the people of South Vietnam, including the Communists, to participate in free elections. This is in sharp contrast to the Tonkin resolution which gave the President the mandate to take "all necessary steps" to punish the enemy, to bomb, and to send American troops to Vietnam.

I interpret House passage of the resolution as an endorsement of democracy in Vietnam—democracy which is still opposed by the leaders in Saigon. I view it as a clear signal to the South Vietnamese Government that the U.S. Congress believes this war is being prolonged by the intransigence of Saigon to endorse openly the resolution of Vietnam's political differences by the democratic elective process.

Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier, this debate does not deal with the really tough questions on the war. For this reason, I want to digress for a few minutes and say a few things about where we are and where we may be heading.

It was just 2 years ago when I stood before a Tucson audience to express for the first time publicly my dissent on the conduct of the Vietnam war. What moved me to make that speech was my concern about the dangerous direction in which the country was moving, the pursuit of a military victory in a war whose only solution could be political. That night 2 years ago I saw the United States mounting a treadmill that goes even faster, a treadmill called escalation, leading not to victory over communism but rather to a steady increase in the loss of American prestige, property and, most important, lives in the jungles of Southeast Asia.

That night in 1967 I gave the President what was thought by many to be pretty radical counsel. "Mr. President," I said, "you are going to have to extricate us from this war by ending the bombing of North Vietnam and ordering a gradual de-escalation of our entire war effort, starting with the removal of American troops from those areas of South Vietnam which can most easily be defended, and leading to the total withdrawal of U.S. troops." Within a reasonable time, I counseled, we should turn over the balance of this war to the South Vietnamese. In keeping with our commitments, we should continue to supply whatever is needed to maintain the South Vietnamese while the threat continues and as long as we are convinced the Saigon Government is working in the interest of its own people.

Mr. Chairman, the "radical" plan I have just described is policy today. Many of the proposals I made in 1967 have been adopted by Presidents Johnson and Nixon. The present administration must be credited for making the first steps toward peace, steps which I suggested. It has publicly rejected a military victory as a goal, it has started troop withdrawals, and it has shifted our military posture in Vietnam from "maximum pressure" to "protective reaction."

In the last 2 years, we have experienced one of the most remarkable turnabouts in American history. When I first spoke out, escalation was our policy and most favored it. Today our policy is one of getting out, and according to a recent Gallup poll, 55 percent of the American people agree that the war was a mistake.

This is not to say that my advice or the advice of others opposing the war has always been correct. Stopping the bombing, many of us claimed, would lead to negotiations in good faith and perhaps even an end to the fighting. By now it is clear that we were wrong.

If the doves have made mistakes in this war it must be argued that the hawks have made some tragically costly blunders, too. There has seemingly been a complete disregard of economics by those, particularly in the last administration, who used the public treasury in an effort to fabricate a picture of wide allied support for the Vietnam war. Thus, we are beginning to see questions raised like these: Did we "buy" the use of 12,000 Thai troops for a billion dollars? Did we pay off the Philippines in the amount of $38 million for, at most, 2,200 noncombatants? What price have we paid and are we paying for South Korean troops fighting beside American?

Nevertheless, we are now committed to bringing about peaceful settlement of the Vietnam war or, failing that, an end to America's role in it. That is the real meaning of the resolution we are debating today.

The time then has come for us to stop shouting slogans at each other, to quit arguing about peripheral issues, and to get on with the tough, unpleasant job of working out an early end to the war. "Support the President" is not a policy or program, it is simply a slogan. How are we to give the President total support for a policy he has not yet disclosed? By the same token, what does the phrase "immediate withdrawal" have to offer other than frustration and confusion? The process of leaving, even when that final commitment is made, will take months, perhaps even a year.

Of course, all Americans want to end the war and all of us want to support the President as much as we possibly can. But we must continue to debate the crucial questions: Will the President's policy end or prolong the war? Will an orderly pullout, such as I advocate, bring about a bloodbath of innocents or drastically affect U.S. influence and commitments elsewhere?

So there is honest and intelligent dispute over the tactics for bringing America's role in Vietnam to an end. In resolving this dispute, we get no help from those who claim it is, "Nixon's war" or those who would label as snobs or question the patriotism of sincere people advocating a different plan of withdrawal.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the President now has a plan which he firmly believes will lead to peace. A majority of Americans seem inclined to give the President additional time to try it. For the sake of the country, I really hope it does work, but I feel compelled to register my honest judgment that it will only lead to a new military and diplomatic stalemate at a lower level of violence continuing well into the 1970's. The plan I think is now being contemplated involves a continuation of U.S. logistic and air support with perhaps 200,000 Americans remaining in Vietnam while Asians continue to kill Asians. The fatal defect of this policy is that it apparently leaves the final decisions about America's future in the hands of the ruthless dictatorship in Hanoi and/or a repressive, corrupt and unrepresentative semidictatorship in Saigon.

My own view is that troop withdrawals should be continued at an orderly rate, and on a predetermined schedule, leading to substantially complete disengagement of American troops by the end of 1970. Such predetermined and orderly withdrawals are the only instruments we have for pressuring badly needed reforms on the Saigon government, a regime which still refuses to admit broader participation in the processes of Government, while continuing to censor and close newspapers and jail political opponents.

While we are now going through an acrimonious and troubling time, I believe we are in the process of winding down this war and groping our way toward its termination. Just how it will end I can't really predict, but the process is underway and most probably will not be reversed. If we all keep our heads and our tempers, the country can come through this frustrating and unsettling experience without being torn apart.

Mr. PRICE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, as one of the many sponsors of the resolution "toward peace with justice in Vietnam," I urge all my colleagues to add their support to the proposal. Since this resolution was first introduced, almost three-fourths of the House membership have cosponsored the resolution or introduced similar ones. These duly-elected Members represent a great majority of the American people, and I am confident they are expressing the overwhelming wishes of their constituents on this matter.

In my view, the resolution before the House is simple, straightforward, and direct. It affirms the support of the House of Representatives for the President of the United States in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. It expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for an honorable negotiated settlement of the war. It calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures the United States has made in good faith to the Government of North Vietnam. It approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese, supervised by an impartial international body. It declares that the United States will abide by the election results, and it calls upon the Government of North Vietnam to do likewise so that the war in Vietnam can be resolved and peace can be restored to Southeast Asia.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much debate about both the terms of the resolution and the supposed policy implications that flow from the terms. This debate, although well intentioned, misses the basic thrust and purpose of the resolution. The House of Representatives, through the resolution, is not attempting to hammer out a Congressional policy position with respect to Vietnam, it is merely attempting to express our feeling of support for the efforts of the President of the United States to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

This is a laudable goal, a goal whose noble purpose should be affirmed, and affirmed now. The Communist overlords of North Vietnam think they have the United States on the run. They think the people of the United States are bitterly divided over the war and will not support the President in his quest for peace. They fail to realize that the rumblings of discontent they hear and the demonstrations they see are merely the voices and actions of some, but by no means a majority of the American people. Some of the protestors are dedicated anarchists, others are admitted hard-core Communists. Some are misguided social reformers, others are everyday people trying to express their sense of frustration at a war which has dragged on and on without appearing to have an end in sight.

I disagree with the protestors. I think they are betraying the bloody sacrifices that our American soldiers have made to bring freedom to the struggling people of South Vietnam. In addition, their actions are creating false illusions in the minds of the North Vietnamese that the American will to see the cause of freedom triumph in Southeast Asia is wasting away. As a direct result of their delusions about our national state of mind, the Communists have stalled the Paris peace talks, and are presently waiting in a confident pose for the American forces to depart from Vietnam.

As far as I am concerned, and I am confident that my views are shared by an overwhelming majority of Americans, the United States has no intention of deserting the valiant people of South Vietnam and leaving them to the bloody hands of the Communists. President Nixon has stated that the United States will not settle for anything less than peace with honor in Vietnam. The House resolution Toward Peace with Justice in Vietnam voices congressional support of his efforts for peace. Both the President's efforts and the House resolution merits our total and undivided approval.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, today I will vote "no" on House Resolution 613, relating to Vietnam policy with great regret because it is my desire to applaud and encourage every initiative of the President toward peace as I have done in the past.

Is it possible, that, after 15 years of involvement, 4½ years of overt military action, the efforts of more than a million men, the deaths of 40,000 servicemen, the wounding of more than 300,000 American young men, the expenditure of billions of dollars, the divisions created here at home, the destruction wrought on Vietnam and the diplomatic efforts engaged in by ourselves and others around the globe—is it possible that, after all this tragic experience, the best that the House of Representatives of the United States of America can produce is a 17-line resolution which vaguely commits us to a peaceful settlement through measures largely unexplained in the resolution itself or omitted entirely?

Surely, we have learned enough in the past few years to come up with something better than this.

And yet, it seems we have not. Having been speedily rushed to the floor without hearings before the Foreign Affairs Committee, under a closed rule which forbids amendment, at a time when we clearly have the concern and the knowledge to conduct a truly meaningful debate on Vietnam, we are asked to approve an amorphous resolution which will become, almost certainly, a constitutional sanction for just about anything the administration desires.

I think we are shirking our responsibility, as elected representatives, to legislate creatively.

And I believe we are blindly taking the same path we took in August of 1964 when we handed the previous administration a similar resolution on the Tonkin Gulf incident which, time and again, was cited as justification for the limitless American involvement in Vietnam, although few Members of this body would have believed so when they voted for it.

Have not we in the legislative branch learned our lesson?

Who here today would defend the Tonkin resolution in terms of what followed? Who would admit that he knew then the implications of his vote?

And yet, this House is doing precisely the same thing today and, in the process, abdicating its responsibility to the American people.

I think the American people deserve better from us than a single page statement of 169 words in a single sentence.

And I believe this body had better start standing up, under this system of checks and balances, and stop acting like a rubber stamp.

What this resolution offers is vague and harmless. It was meant to be vague and harmless so that we in Congress could not make any waves and so that thoughtful people in this body would be trapped in the seeming dilemma of voting "yes" for the President or "no" against peace.

This is no time for political games, played by the administration or by anyone else, in a diplomatic arena whose only foundation is the stark tragedy of Vietnam.

I do not believe there is a thoughtful person left in this country who, after the experience of this decade, cannot see through such an attempt.

What this resolution does not offer is even more significant than what it states. We should be seeking a clear formula for peace, not a vague resolution which seems to support every specific of administration policy by implication but which fails to enunciate it.

Nor does this resolution commit us for 1 minute to future troop withdrawals. It does not spell out our negotiating position and yet it asks us to support the President's efforts.

But most seriously, this resolution—and by extension, this kind of legislative maneuver—asks us to surrender our legislative prerogatives and blindly follow the President, regardless of our convictions and without taking the time even to spell out our position.

I am voting "no" and I look forward to a better alternative, a genuine debate, and a creative legislative discussion more worthy of this body and more worthy of the American people.

I do not intend to vote for any resolution on the vital issue of peace and war which does not spell out our policy clearly and which does not permit the Congress its prerogative to debate, discuss, amend, and thereby check Executive authority.

In the instance of Vietnam, my own position and my differences with the administration are clearly spelled out in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 15. I am submitting that speech again today to make my position on this vital issue clear in detail. I wish the sponsor of this resolution and the administration had done likewise with H.R. 613.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Oct. 15, 1969]

PEACE IN VIETNAM

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this is a very difficult time for our country.

Perhaps, after so many years of involvement and frustration, we have finally arrived at the moment of truth in Vietnam.

It seems as if the point has been reached where we either stay indefinitely or disengage ourselves from a tragic experience for America and the world.

The other alternative—once thought of as possible—military victory and a reasonably speedy compromise negotiated settlement—have all but vanished.

The choice we have left is not easy.

The consequences of either course of action can be far reaching for ourselves, for the Vietnamese and for the rest of the world.

If we stay, it means the sacrifice of more American lives, the expenditure of more billions of dollars, deeper division at home and the neglect of many other national priorities, both foreign and domestic.

If we leave, the future will be largely uncertain. Some contend that South Vietnam will go Communist and that Southeast Asia will follow suit. They warn that America's commitments will be placed in doubt and we shall be left to fight a larger war somewhere else.

Others, casting aside these warnings, believe that withdrawal offers more possibilities and greater opportunities.

Because these are the alternatives, it is, indeed, a very difficult time for our country.

And all of us—regardless of our politics, our way of looking at the world or our past position in Vietnam—must, if we truly love this country, approach these choices without prejudice and without rancor for those with whom we disagree.

Motives on all sides may be good. But what we seek is a solution which will do justice to our good motivations.

Today, there is no room for those who would attempt to make this Nixon's war.

Nor is there room for those who would continue to make it Johnson's war.

There is no room for those who lash out at critics, equating patriotism with mindless unquestioning of the facts in Vietnam.

Nor is there room for those who believe that Vietnam has proven America to be sick, and dominated by military-industrial forces beyond our control.

Young and old, Democrat and Republican: All of us had better recognize the enormity of what faces us. And all of us had better act with reason and wisdom larger than ourselves.

As the moment of truth arrives, all of our preconceptions must give way to a single concern: What is the right thing for our country and how will our decision affect the peace of the world.

It is unfortunate that these are the only alternatives.

But they are.

Virtually no one any longer believes that military victory is a possible alternative.

President Johnson ruled that out as early as March of 1968.

And President Nixon specifically so stated in May 1969 when he addressed the Nation with the following words: "We have ruled out attempting to impose a purely military solution on the battlefield."

Yet, there is another alternative which still seems possible to some and that is the alternative of a compromise settlement, a negotiated peace which would salvage a non-Communist South Vietnam or a partially non-Communist South Vietnam or, at the very least, a neutralized South Vietnam.

The search for a compromise settlement has been the true issue of the past few years. It was the initial thrust of the antiadministration forces during the 1968 presidential campaign.

Then, the question was: Which candidate was flexible enough, in contrast to the inflexibility of President Johnson, to offer compromise terms sufficiently attractive to the North Vietnamese.

Proposals for a coalition government were followed by suggestions for mutual troop withdrawal. And, finally, late in the campaign, we had a total bombing halt which

Vice President Humphrey endorsed as an acceptable risk for peace.

All of these suggestions, sincere and well-intentioned, were made in the hope that, by throwing another bone, we would tempt the North Vietnamese to give and take in the traditional manner of western diplomacy.

Finally, in May of 1969, determined as were his predecessor and his competitors in 1968, a new President spoke of "neutrality for South Vietnam," "acceptance of any government in South Vietnam that results from the free choice of the South Vietnamese people themselves," and "reunification."

All of these proposals have spanned the course of the past few years. And, as each was proposed, there was renewed hope of a breakthrough on the diplomatic front.

Recall, if you will, the wave of hope which swept the country and the world when President Johnson announced that the enemy was prepared to negotiate in Paris.

And then recall the renewed hope when he announced the total bombing halt a year ago.

And finally, recall the optimism with which we greeted President Nixon's first major address on Vietnam last May.

Yet, today, the deadlock remains in Paris and the stalemate continues on the battlefield.

After nearly 2 years of specific concessions, the latest reports from Paris, according to Time magazine of October 17, tell of "The dispiriting sense of tedium and pessimism that envelops the talks and the American delegation."

In asking ourselves why the deadlock remains, I think we must honestly face the possibility that North Vietnam will not negotiate seriously as long as there is dissent here in America.

A few years ago, the same argument appeared in different colors.

At that time, those in favor of ending the war cried out for negotiations. And the supporters of the war replied that, we would, in effect, be inviting the North Vietnamese to win at the conference table what they could not win on the battlefield.

Well, today we are negotiating.

And today, those same people are now saying that, in dissenting here at home, we are, in effect, inviting the North Vietnamese to win in America what they cannot win at the conference table.

Where does this downward spiral end? Where do we go next?

The fact is that there has been virtually no criticism for 9 months.

The voices which echoed through 1968 have been largely still.

Republicans, Democrats and concerned Americans everywhere have sat back, waiting for a break in Paris, hoping that a new President, untied, as he said, to the mistake of the past, would extricate us from the quicksand.

Yet, during the time we have remained silent, the North Vietnamese have remained inscrutable.

And today, because the question of Vietnam is once again raised publicly, some of our policymakers recoil from the renewed debate and warn that the only thing which will defeat us is ourselves.

They equate patriotism with mindless acquiescence and unquestioning support.

They suggest that those who are unhappy with our policy "tell it to Hanoi." But this is our country and it is our policy we are deeply concerned about. It is not inconsistent to discuss our policy while at the same time repudiating Hanoi and its methods.

The deadlock has remained at Paris, through protest and through silence, and that fact alone tells us that we must look somewhere else for the root cause of the lack of movement.

In fact, the deadlock remains because the other side continues to say what it has said for years. There is no room for a compromise, they say because this is a Vietnamese affair. It is a civil dispute. It is a matter to be settled—not by concession of an American President or the force of American arms—but by the Vietnamese themselves.

And that settlement will come when the Americans go home and stop interfering in the affairs of their country.

How simple that fact is.

And yet, how often have we overlooked it in our endless search for a formula and, indeed, in our initial rationale for entering this war.

Dean Rusk, the former Secretary of State, was fond of saying that the war will end when the North Vietnamese leave their neighbors alone. The implication was clear: America, in the role of policeman, intends to keep peace in the neighborhood.

To the other side, this is not the case.

In the eyes of the Vietnamese, the North and South are not two neighbors who happen to live on the same block. They are residents of the same house and the American policeman is guilty of invasion of privacy.

Whether one agrees with this viewpoint or not, in fact, whether one wishes to face it or not, it is nonetheless, what the other side has been saying for years.

And today, after we cut away the agony and complexity of the past, we must come face to face with that central fact. In the eyes of the Vietnamese, the war is a civil conflict which will be settled, if at all, only by the Vietnamese.

Misunderstanding of the facts of history has led to misunderstanding here at home.

Those who took the time and made the effort to understand what was happening in Vietnam, sooner or later came to the conclusion that this is, indeed, a civil conflict.

And because they believed this, they felt that our involvement was immoral. This feeling, in turn, led to a crisis of conscience among many of our own people and often to civil disobedience, particularly by the younger generation, not merely because the younger generation had to fight the war but because the younger generation began to understand the war.

All of the debate of the past few years sprang, not from the question of whether the war was winnable or unwinnable, but from the growing conviction that the war was unjust.

On the other hand, those who did not take the time to understand the war—and its complexity is so deep that this position is understandable too—those particularly who fought other wars for America, could not see where this war was any different.

"We of an older generation fought to keep this nation free in Europe and the Pacific," they say. "We gave our lives in Korea. What makes you so special that you take it upon yourself to judge this war. Maybe you're just afraid to go and fight like we did. Maybe you're getting too soft."

Thus does the division deepen and the misunderstanding grow. The tragic flaw of recent American leadership has been its inability to understand the moral implications of Vietnam.

It is hardly surprising, then, that the average American, who depends on his leaders for enlightenment, cannot fully comprehend today the notion of an unjust war and cannot understand why we do not win and, therefore, cannot accept dissent at home.

And yet, as I said in the beginning, what is needed now is not censure and division but the calm and enlightened determination to choose one of only two alternatives which we have left: An indefinite American presence in Vietnam or the liquidation of a tragic situation.

The consequences of the first alternative are clear—more fighting, more killing, greater cost, deeper division here at home, neglect of our other priorities and all of this with little likelihood of a diplomatic settlement. The only concrete achievement would be the continued propping up of an artificial, unrepresentative, corrupt and unreformable military dictatorship in Saigon.

Our willingness in word to accept the free choice of the South Vietnamese does not correspond to our over-willingness indeed to prop up the Saigon regime and that fact alone presents an insurmountable barrier to peace.

And so, I have come to believe, with many other Americans and with many other elected officials and government servants, that the United States must simply extricate itself from Vietnam by beginning now an orderly, total, relentless and publicly announced withdrawal and disengagement.

In suggesting such a course of action, I do not believe that we can set a specific timetable. Withdrawal is not going to occur overnight. Nor is it likely to occur within the artificial limits of an arbitrary deadline.

I do believe that the orderly and systematic withdrawal must allow for adjustments, not only in Vietnam but here at home.

In Vietnam, withdrawal should be accompanied by efforts on our part to encourage the development of the many and diversified political forces within the country to take on renewed life, a life ruthlessly and thoughtlessly suppressed by Saigon, in behalf of their own future.

The key question—indeed, the realistic question—is not when the last man will leave Vietnam. It is whether or not we, as a nation, are committed to the inevitable and total withdrawal of all forces as soon as possible as a matter of policy. The chief need is to be publicly and irrevocably committed to disengagement.

There are voices which say we simply cannot withdraw, as if this were a simple decision.

It is not a simple decision.

It challenges the American people to face up to the facts and we have been notoriously unwilling to do so throughout this war.

It demands of our leaders the courage, the leadership and the persuasive powers to make such a decision acceptable to many who believe withdrawal to be unthinkable.

Such things are never easy.

They are agonizingly difficult.

But the time has come. Mr. Nixon must simply summon up the will to think the unthinkable and face the inevitable. It will be better if he does so now because sooner or later, he will inevitably be forced to do so anyway.

I believe the President wants to end this war.

And I believe that his recent actions—particularly the withdrawal of 60,000 American troops—are steps in the right direction.

But the difference between his position and that of his critics is an essential difference.

On the one hand, Mr. Nixon hints at further reductions in troops during 1970.

But, on the other, he solemnly warns against a "disguised American defeat" and hopes to "Vietnamize" the war.

Those who disagree with his policies, while they support the moves he has already taken, want a commitment to complete withdrawal based on a firm Executive decision to extricate this country from Vietnam.

In reality, he reserves the option to stay indefinitely or to go back in with additional force, presumably at the point where Vietnamization does not work and at the point where the Saigon government begins to fall apart.

The Saigon government knows that.

As long as they know that the United States is not totally and publicly committed to a planned withdrawal, we can expect nothing from them except further dependence.

They have no intention of letting us go.

And, at times, it seems as if Mr. Nixon has no intention of letting them go.

Therefore, what seems at first glance to be the beginning of withdrawal is on the other side of the coin a formula for an indefinite stay.

And that is the point at which we disagree—not on the desire to end the war, not on the desire to get out, and not even on the common agreement that the Vietnamese must solve their own problems. Mr. Nixon is reluctant to commit us to a final decision. And his critics suspect that, as long as this is his policy we probably are committed to staying indefinitely.

I have not come to the decision to support a committed withdrawal without considering all of the possible dire consequences lurking in the dark recesses of the cold war mind.

Nor can I totally censure those whose beliefs based on the assumptions of their own experience immediately after World War II.

At that time the world was in dire need of American help.

The military hardware of Stalinist communism was locking up the gates of Eastern Europe and Russia's Asian partner had just seized the most populated nation in the world.

We soon found ourselves in a bloody conflict of naked aggression in Korea, and a movement at home which saw a Communist behind every State Department file box.

I suspect that that era has passed.

But two Presidents seem to tell me differently.

And many policymakers in Washington agree with them.

They warn us sternly of the consequences if we take the unheard of step and leave Vietnam.

They point to Czechoslovakia and say: "See, the Russians have not changed." And this should rightfully cause us concern.

And, although Russia and China have come to the brink of war, we are still asked to live under the shadow of the international monolithic and single-minded Communist conspiracy.

For a moment, let us have an end to the glowing, muttering, and warning of dark consequences and let us look at the possible results of withdrawal.

Let us examine the contention that South Vietnam will go Communist.

And before we rend our garments, let us also admit that this possibility is precisely admitted by President Nixon. In saying that he would have no objection to a united Vietnam and in admitting the necessity of free election, he is admitting the possibility of Communist victory.

But there are other possibilities and these other possibilities are just as likely to occur when we announce withdrawal.

At present, literally hundreds of non-Communist political factions in the South, in the least of which is the Buddhist, are inactive due to resentment of our presence or in jail due to the repression of the Saigon regime.

Is it not just as likely that, with our steady departure, non-Communist South Vietnam, will begin to exercise its own freedom within the country.

I am not sure. But, in any event, I suggest that the viability of political life in South Vietnam will be encouraged more by our departure than by our consistent propping up of the military dictatorship with our power and prestige.

And what of the million South Vietnamese in the armed forces. Like all armies, they certainly are not going to do the job as long as America is so willing to shed its blood in their place.

Perhaps, if the Saigon government is worth saving, its million men just may fight for it.

Or perhaps they might overthrow it.

Or perhaps the regime itself, no longer shielded by American military strength, may, in its desperation, grant the freedoms and give the inspiration which the nation needs.

At any rate, if the million man army cannot do any of these things, then the question again arises whether we ever could do so or whether that million man army is worth being shielded by American soldiers.

Disregarding the other possibilities, however, opponents of withdrawal, convinced of an imminent Communist takeover, have added another dire consequence and that is the possibility of mass slaughter in the South.

We do not know if this will happen. There seems to be no evidence that it will any more than there is evidence that it will not.

America has proven itself a generous nation in the past. Provision can be made for relief, asylum, and even additional economic aid to South Vietnam. Certainly, these are legitimate accommodations to make in return for the liquidation of the war.

And what of the rest of Southeast Asia.

If one accepts the domino theory, one believes that all or most of Southeast Asia will fall into Communist hands once American troops leave South Vietnam.

And yet, one of the most compelling sections of Defense Secretary Clifford's narrative, which documents his own change in thinking, concerns the other countries of Southeast Asia.

Returning from South Vietnam in 1967, Clifford said:

"It was strikingly apparent that the other troop contributing countries no longer shared our degree of concern about the war."

Thailand, he said "Was in no hurry to allocate more troops."

He continued:

"The President of the Philippines advised President Johnson that he preferred we not stop there because of possible adverse public reaction."

Australia's Prime Minister, Clifford continues, "presented a long list of reasons why Australia was already close to its maximum effort."

New Zealand "made it clear that any appreciable increase was out of the question" and the Prime Minister of Singapore, when asked to help with troops, said he "saw no possibility of that taking place because of the adverse political effect in Singapore."

Finally, Clifford looks at the situation in Southeast Asia in this way:

"The security of the Pacific region will depend upon the ability of the countries there to meet the legitimate growing demands of their own people. No military strength we can bring to bear can give them internal stability or popular acceptance. In Southeast Asia, and elsewhere in the less developed regions of the world, our ability to understand and to control the basic forces that are at play is a very limited one. We can advise, we can urge, we can furnish economic aid. But American military power cannot build nations, any more than it can solve the social and economic problems that face us here at home."

And again, a few months ago, President Nixon, in his Pacific doctrine, told the Asians that America's vital interests are no longer concerned with sending massive numbers of Americans to the mainland of Asia.

As in South Vietnam itself, withdrawal opens as many possibilities as it does pitfalls for Southeast Asia. The possibility of increased economic activity, greater concentration by America itself on broad programs to improve the social and economic life of the region and the development of indigenous democratic governments—all these things are just as possible as the facile, automatic response that says, take away American troops and the inevitable answer is communism.

Such an answer is not only narrow. It is far too simplistic for a complex world. And it betrays a defeatism which ill befits American leadership. In place of our single-minded obsession with Vietnam, we could today be using our technology and resources to create a better world.

One other question about America's role in the world comes up whenever withdrawal from Vietnam is suggested. What about America's commitments. Will our word ever be heeded again. Because we show lack of faith, will not our relative role, vis-a-vis the Communists, begin to decline in world affairs.

In the first place, no nation in the history of the world has ever commited so much for so long a period in so many places throughout the world and stuck by its treaties and agreements with such tenacity. In Vietnam alone, that commitment has amounted to 40,000 dead Americans and more than $100 billion over the course of 8 years. And all this despite the fact that there is considerable debate about the genuineness of that commitment in the first place. The question is not whether we honor our commitments because our activity has certainly been some commitment. The question is whether we alone in the world are being asked to do the impossible. Our own leaders who pose this question evidently believe that the rest of the world sees us as the superhuman, transcendental force which dares not to put a ceiling on how far it is prepared to go lest the rest of the world react with utter dismay.

And yet, the rest of the world's powers can go blithely ahead doing just as they please—abandoning allies, subverting countries and waging war.

Only America is put to the impossible test. If we dare waver for a moment—regardless of the merits—then the world itself will shake with concern.

I suspect that we judge ourselves too harshly.

I believe that we demand a standard from ourselves that few others expect and that fewer others are prepared to live up to.

We are not superhuman.

We do not by ourselves control the destiny of the world.

And a change of policy in Vietnam will be greeted throughout the world more with relief than dismay anyhow.

Here at home, it is another matter.

It is said the President fears, privately, that a systematic withdrawal from Vietnam will not only cause us to lose our leadership position in the world but will, as Stewart Alsop said last week, turn the nation "angrily in upon itself."

This need not be and it should not be. It hardly does justice to us as a people. At any rate, such a situation remains a leadership problem. If the President and other leaders of our Nation choose to permit us to turn angrily upon ourselves, it may well happen. But, if they lead us out of the quagmire in Vietnam into a constructive and hopeful future, no such conclusion need be drawn.

None of these thoughts are comfortable.

And nothing is sure.

Choosing the alternative of withdrawal has its uncertainties.

But the ambiguity of present policy presents more.

I am suggesting that such a decision, articulated by enlightened leadership, opens up more possibilities for America than pitfalls.

It opens the possibility for a country united once again with this burden lifted from our minds.

It opens the possibility for greater attention to our domestic problems.

It may give us the chance to chart a new foreign policy, concerned with turning our technology and compassion to human needs and to the great problems of bringing peace and stability among all nations.

Emerson—and other distinguished American thinkers after him—have spoken about two distinct strains in the American spirit. One is the party of hope. The other is the party of despair.

I believe we have, in the recent past, been too often concerned with the inhibitions of the party of despair.

We have been generous. We have been great. Perhaps we have saved the world.

But we have also largely conducted ourselves in the world as if the most dire consequences were also the most real and immediate. And feeling this way, we have been very reluctant to test new directions.

Today, I think it is time for all Americans not to join the partisan interests of either Republicans or Democrats but to join the party of hope.

Let us end this war in Vietnam.

And let us use that decision as a departure point for shaping a more stable and hopeful society here at home and peace around the world.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have read this resolution many many times. It is a short resolution and apparently almost nobody disagrees with any one clause in the resolution. About all it says is that we hope peace can be secured in South Vietnam. Of course, everyone is for peace; but what concerns me the most is that almost everyone, including President Nixon, seems to read things into this resolution which it simply does not say.

For almost 2 years, our Government has been pursuing what might be called the Clark Clifford plan. Under that plan, it was determined that we will Vietnamize the war and withdraw our troops if the South Vietnamese can be trained to defend themselves and protect their citizens against mass slaughter for mere political and religious reasons. Under this plan, troops have been in training and a major effort has been made in that direction for about 2 years. Under the plan, it reached the place about 6 months ago where our withdrawals could start and be coincided with the South Vietnamese troops replacing our troops. In other words, this has been the plan for about 2 years and it has been gradually executed over that period of time. I do not see where there has been any change of policy whatsoever.

This resolution merely says that we endorse and support efforts to secure peace in Vietnam. The claims that this is some kind of a resolution to endorse a "new" plan or that it is some kind of an endorsement in blank for further action simply cannot be justified by reading the resolution. In fact I tend to agree with those who say the resolution itself does nothing other than to afford a vehicle for further debate in the House on our overall policies.

What this resolution does not do and what neither "doves" nor "hawks" are not talking about is a study and complete review of our treaty obligations with Japan. Following World War II, we negotiated a treaty with Japan under which we prohibited them from rearming and in return we agreed to furnish the balance of power in that area. We did this on the theory that there would be less risk of another all-out war if we furnished the balance of power instead of letting them become strong enough militarily to defend themselves against potential enemies. Due to their development and industrial capacity, Japan would be a real prize for China or Russia and an armed force sufficient to defend themselves would also have the capacity to wage war. Our policy under this treaty may have been partly the reason why we have not had a nuclear war in the past 25 years and an all-out mobilization with millions being killed; but no one can prove what would have happened. I do think it is time that we faced all of the facts involved in Southeast Asia and meet new decisions concerning our alliances both with Japan and other countries.

My vote on the resolution will not indicate that I think that the resolution is an endorsement of any particular type of action and I believe that is one point upon which the vast majority can agree.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, let us assume at the outset that the universal desire among our people is to end the tragedy in Vietnam by achieving a just peace. How could it be otherwise? Who is there among us who seeks an unjust peace? To ask the question is to answer it. But while men may agree as to the goal of a just peace in Vietnam, reasonable men may differ as to how peace is to be achieved, or indeed, what the definition of just peace is.

Five years ago, this House, in near unanimity, passed another resolution to support executive policy in Vietnam. I venture to think few of us who voted for the Tonkin Gulf resolution conceived at that time that our action would be utilized to justify the sending of 500,000 American troops into combat. This House has received a good deal of criticism since that time for abdicating our responsibility to give adequate consideration to the contents or ramifications of the Tonkin resolution.

Now, we are presented with another resolution calling for support of executive policy in Vietnam—a resolution whose contents received but cursory review in the Foreign Affairs Committee and which was brought before us under a rule which bars all amendatory language, no matter how pertinent to the issue. As our able and distinguished Republican colleague from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY), has said—the resolution does not even incorporate the most significant aspect of the President's policy—his decision to withdraw American combat troops from Vietnam.

But there is an even more serious flaw in this resolution—an ambiguity which has been alluded to in the debate on the rule. The flaw lies in the fact that the resolution was drafted prior to the President's speech of November 3. In that speech the President holds out the prospect of our indefinite presence in Vietnam at some undefined level of involvement. Moreover, he does not foreclose the possibility of some future escalation of that involvement. But there is nothing whatever in the body of this resolution alluding to a possible escalation of the American presence.

Mr. Chairman, the stated rationale for adoption of this resolution is to present a united front to North Vietnam—to convince the adversary that the President speaks for all the American people. If that is indeed the purpose of the resolution, why was it deemed necessary to stifle any measured consideration of its contents in committee? Why was it brought here under a gag rule in defiance of all democratic principles? Would it not have been the better part of wisdom to have the contents of this resolution receive the most thorough and reasoned consideration of which this House is capable?

Mr. Chairman, we would all like to see an expression emerge from this House which would at once sustain the President and express the deepest hopes of the American people in their desire for a just peace in Vietnam. Such an expression could have emerged had consideration been given to the amendatory language advanced by the gentleman from Illinois and if the resolution could have incorporated the terminology suggested by the distinguished gentlelady from Hawaii.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the resolution, for the subject matter is infinitely too important and complex to be properly disposed of by 435 Members of the House in such circumstances and with so little consideration.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States recently initiated and promoted a patriotic project known as "Operation Speak Out." This project was designed to promote national unity and to encourage the American people to show their support of their Government in its efforts to achieve a just peace in Vietnam. Many civic and patriotic groups and organizations across our Nation saw the merit in "Operation Speak Out" and have given it their support. The action of the House of Representatives today in overwhelmingly adopting the "Peace with Justice in Vietnam" resolution can in some measure be attributed to the great support of the American people awakened by the speech of President Nixon on November 3 and expressed by the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the many other patriotic organizations and individuals who felt that the time had come for patriots to be heard.

The message of the true patriot is a simple one. "My country, right or wrong." A patriot will not give aid and comfort to the enemy, by word or deed. A patriot will not jeopardize the lives of his countrymen, our troops on the battlefields of Vietnam, by seeking to undermine his country before world opinion. Patriotism does not mean that one's country is always without fault, but it does mean that one has enough love and respect for his homeland to try to correct its errors within the framework of its laws. Patriotism does not mean that one must refrain from debate or dissent, but it does mean that one viewing this Nation from beyond its boundaries should see only unity of purpose, the national purpose, arrived at by the processes of government as we, the people have designed them. One would hope that the world could see us, as a country, as the psalmist of the Scriptures envisioned when in Psalm 133, he wrote:

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.

There are those today who believe in the brotherhood of all mankind. I am one of them. However, there are those who are under the mistaken belief that patriotic love of one's country is inconsistent with love of all mankind. How would these exercise their love of mankind? What better mechanism to serve mankind is there than the United States of America? If they are not prepared to love America first, one has reason to doubt that their professed love of mankind is sincere. Certainly it is not practical. Rudyard Kipling helped us with this dilemma when he wrote:

God gave all men all earth to love,
But since our hearts are small,
Ordained for each one spot should prove Beloved over all.

Let us show our capacity to love by loving our neighbor first, by loving America first. If we are to make the world a better place in which to live, let us start at home. And let our effort be in peace, in tolerance, and in appreciation of the rights of our fellow man. Let no one of us think that he has a monopoly on the desire for peace. Let no one of us set ourselves up as judge, because to do so is to perhaps cause another American to die in Vietnam. Let us go forward in unity and harmony, toward a common goal, peace and justice in all the world. If you doubt that this is America's goal, then you reject the lessons of history and the sacrifices of American patriots whose lives have made it possible for you to have the freedom to reject or to dissent with impunity.

Today I want to reaffirm my belief in the American patriot, patriots like the members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who to a man, believe that the blows which their country called upon them to strike, were struck for all mankind.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, this resolution, House Resolution 613, on its face, would seem to do no more than to express the hope of the American people for a just peace, approve South Vietnamese self-determination through free and open elections and support the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace. Certainly I support the negotiation of a just peace in Vietnam and Vietnamese self-determination through free and open elections.

My vote in favor of this resolution is simply an expression of support for these objectives and for all reasonable and responsible efforts by the President to achieve such objectives.

It has also been suggested that adoption of the resolution will enhance the possibilities for a peaceful settlement in Vietnam. I hope that this is the case but I doubt it. In any event, the President has the responsibility for the conduct of our foreign affairs. If a peaceful settlement is to be negotiated, it is the President who must negotiate it. In such an effort, I repeat, he certainly has my support.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, some apparently believe that the resolution has a broader significance. The President himself appears to be one of those who would give this resolution such significance. On his visit to the House last month, he embraced the resolution as "a resolution for a just peace in Vietnam along the lines of the proposal I made in a speech on November 3."

But, Mr. Chairman, the resolution was drafted and circulated before, not after, the President's November 3 speech. The drafter of the resolution, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), and its floor manager, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS), have now both denied that the resolution was intended to or that it does constitute an endorsement of the contents of the President's November 3 statement or that it gives advance approval to any action the President might decide will improve prospects for a just peace.

Their action in doing so has helped me to resolve my own doubts about this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, when I came to Congress in 1959 a Republican President occupied the White House. I supported his policies when I thought they were right and opposed them when I thought they were wrong. In doing so I ended up supporting his foreign policies more often than most Republican Members. But as much as I respected President Eisenhower I did not agree with everything he did nor did I ever give him a blank check for any policy he might adopt.

I shall try to follow the same policy with respect to President Nixon, reserving judgment on his policies until I know what they are, supporting him when I think he is right and opposing him when I think he is wrong.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the resolution. I suppose I must say that I do so not because I oppose a just peace, or self-determination in Vietnam, or because I secretly hope for a Communist victory. One would think that this kind of unctuous explanation would be unnecessary in a body of this stature, but, unfortunately, some of my recent mail and a few of the statements of my more hawkish colleagues indicates the contrary.

No, Mr. Chairman, I do not even oppose the language of the resolution. While much of importance is omitted, on its face the measure is really quite innocuous. Nevertheless, despite all the backing and filling that has pervaded this Chamber today, there is absolutely no doubt in my mind that this resolution has been offered for one, and only one, purpose—to give a total endorsement to President Nixon's Vietnam policy as delineated in his November 3 speech. That, to my mind, is far from innocuous, and is the sole reason I shall vote "no" on House Resolution 613.

When I think of some of Mr. Nixon's recent handiwork: the appointment of Clement Haynsworth; the attempt to delay desegregation of southern schools; the abandonment of Equal Employment Opportunity Commission hearings; the decision to let the Voting Rights Act die; and the general unconcern for pressing domestic problems, I would have a difficult time supporting the President's war policies even if I thought they were sound—which I do not. I would be much more inclined to support a resolution that we turn our attention back to America.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I voted against the closed-rule procedure under which this resolution is now being considered. I voted against the closed rule with the hope and the purpose of permitting a thorough discussion and promoting a definite understanding of the precise meaning, extent, and application of the resolution. Let us remember that no committee hearings were held on this resolution and I think every Member here will recall that the Congress and the country has suffered, in the past, some sad experiences and unfortunate misunderstandings about the exact meaning and application of this type of resolution.

However, since the majority approved the closed-rule procedure, I intend to vote in favor of the resolution, on the patriotic and practical principle that we cannot afford, in our agonizing pursuit of the earliest possible peace in Vietnam, to give any further ammunition to the Communist propaganda machine to strengthen the determination of their people or provide any additional grounds for the Hanoi leaders to possibly misunderstand the general willingness of Congress to cooperate with our Commander in Chief to honorably end the Vietnam war at the earliest possible moment.

The resolution, as it stands, in simple language and substance, proposes only to support the President of the United States in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, proclaims the peaceful overtures this Government has already made, again advocates the principles of free elections by the people of South Vietnam and this country's willingness to abide by them, and further exhorts the Government of North Vietnam to do likewise.

I would like to emphasize what has, I hope, already been made very clear here; namely, that this resolution is not meant or intended and should not be construed to preendorse and preapprove every and any future specific action that the Commander in Chief may see fit to take in his plans and desire to bring the earliest possible ending to the Vietnam war. With that understanding, House Resolution 613 is a simple and summary reaffirmation of our common desire for speedy peace in Vietnam which I shall support, rather than take a chance of strengthening obvious Communist strategy to prolong the war in order to gain the most advantageous terms for peaceful agreement.

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Chairman, two unrelated events—one occuring last evening and the other this morning—that touched my life and my thoughts concerning our terrible dilemma in Vietnam, give added meaning to the action we are about to take.

As we all know, last evening the lottery system was again brought into play as a method for helping us select, as a nation, those young men who might in the future be called upon for service in the Armed Forces and, possibly, even in Vietnam if our involvement in the conflict there is to continue.

My own 19-year-old son, Howard, Jr., was one of those millions of young Americans whose life and future—with the outcome yet to be determined—was affected by the proceedings last evening at selective service headquarters.

Then, this morning, I was invited to attend a ceremony at the White House at which time Vice President AGNEW was to award, posthumously, a Medal of Honor—the Nation's highest military decoration—to Mr. and Mrs. Leslie C. Graves, of Groton, N.Y., in my congressional district, the parents of Marine Corps 2d Lt. Terrence C. Graves who was killed in action, in Vietnam, on February 16, 1968.

Unhappily, my attendance to other duties here this morning prevented my attendance at that ceremony, but the packet of information relating thereto—including a photograph of Lieutenant Graves—has since been delivered to my office.

Mr. Chairman, I have spent some long moments in the quiet of my office this afternoon looking at Lieutenant Graves' photo—and in reading and rereading the bare statistics of his short life as well as the terse words of the citation describing his heroism above and beyond the call of all duty in the action near Con Thien, in Vietnam, a year ago last February 16 when, as it is written, "He gallantly gave his life for his country."

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman and colleagues, that Lieutenant Graves epitomizes all the brave and gallant young Americans who have served—and died—in far-off Vietnam, even as my son epitomizes those other young Americans who may yet be called to such duty, all in pursuit of something we are discussing here which is called a just peace in Vietnam.

I have been listening, as time required by other duties has permitted, to much of the debate we have had on yesterday and today concerning the resolution before us. It has been an interesting and, I think, a useful debate. I would have preferred—as my vote on the previous question on the rule yesterday indicates—that it was not as narrowly focused as it now necessarily is by virtue of the closed rule that was adopted. But I believe those of us who felt that way—and sought by our votes to open this resolution up to constructive amendments—can now accept House Resolution 613, at face value, for what it actually says and what most of us understand it to mean.

The words of the resolution before us stand on their own two feet—if words can ever be considered as doing so. They are words expressing the American peoples' desire for peace in Vietnam in accordance with principles that none of us could think of in any terms other than just. They are words, too, reaffirming our long-held national commitment to the concept of self-determination for all peoples, everywhere; and they are words declaring our traditional conviction that all disputes between nations or between disputing citizens within a nation might better be settled by ballots rather than bullets. In short, they are words defining an idea for a just peace in Vietnam—or, for that matter, any other trouble spot in a sadly troubled world—to which we can all subscribe.

I shall vote for that idea—as expressed by this resolution of which I am a cosponsor—and I shall do so gladly and without reservations because I can find no real merit in the semantical questions or occasionally semipartisan charges that have here been raised about its true meaning or purpose.

But, after all, House Resolution 613 is but a collection of words—and almost any other combination thereof could have served the same purpose so there is nothing magic about these. And though our acceptance of House Resolution 613, by whatever margin of support it eventually garners, will, I think, be a helpful thing for the Nation and, perhaps, for the cause of a just peace in Vietnam, its enactment, alone, will not produce that peace we all so ardently desire. Its enactment, alone, will not forestall the future selection of still more young Americans to be sent to Vietnam nor end, for at least a time, such tragic but, somehow, uplifting award ceremonies as took place at the White House this morning.

Only our actions from now on with respect to our dilemma in Vietnam can do that—actions that, largely, will have to be of the President's determination and for the direction of which he will need all the courage and wisdom any man, even with God's help, can summon forth.

In that effort—an effort in which all of us, as citizens, will at least indirectly participate—President Nixon shall have my continuing support and prayers.

For I believe him to be now on the right track toward a just peace in Vietnam.

His actions in that respect speak louder, it seems to me, than the words he has addressed to us on this subject—knowing, as he must, that every time he speaks to us he is also speaking to Hanoi and to those other nations who have, unfortunately, assisted Hanoi in her support of the efforts of the Vietcong.

The most significant action President Nixon has yet taken with respect to redirecting our Vietnam policy is, as the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) pointed out on yesterday, to begin the withdrawal of at least our ground troops from the conflict. As we now know, our total forces in Vietnam are now down to their lowest point in some 2 years, and I strongly hope that there will soon be further announcements from the White House regarding still further force reductions.

Such troop withdrawals—made in concert with our success in Vietnamizing such actual ground combat as may still go on—lies at the heart, as Mr. FINDLEY has noted, of what I understand to be the plan by which the President, in his own words, hopes to "bring the war to an end regardless of what happens on the negotiating front."

I believe the American people—or a substantial majority of them—appreciate and support Mr. Nixon's action in this respect, for a winding down of the war insofar as we are concerned, and that they also understand, given the nature of the problem, that deescalation in this fashion can only properly be directed by the President and that, given the hazards it may call into play for both our remaining forces in Vietnam and the South Vietnamese people themselves, this process cannot be hurried too much, will take some time to work out even from the logistical standpoint, and that a stated deadline for the completion of such withdrawals—whether self-imposed by the President and so publicly announced or whether imposed upon him by action of the Congress—would not be helpful and might, indeed, even be counterproductive insofar as any hope of useful negotiations may remain.

Believing, as I have said, that there is a substantial majority of popular support for such a policy, along with an understanding of its complications, I had also hoped—if the previous question on the rule had been voted down on yesterday—that then Mr. FINDLEY could have been recognized, as had been his purpose, to offer an amendment to the resolution before us inserting therein the thrust of his own separate resolution—House Resolution 564—of which I am a cosponsor, endorsing this withdrawal policy and urging its continuation by the President. The additional words that would have thus been added to House Resolution 613 were these:

"and supports the President's expressed determination to withdraw our remaining ground combat forces at the earliest practicable date",

Reference being had, of course, to House of Representatives support of that policy and emphasis being given, to reflect popular opinion, on that phrase "at the earliest practicable date."

For it would be my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the average American believes we have, by now, more than fulfilled whatever commitment we may once have had to the people of South Vietnam in pursuit of helping them preserve their freedoms, and that it is past time for them, in their developing strength, albeit with some continuing assistance from us for some months yet to come, to take over "their war" once again and to go on to win it, if they possibly can, for we have long since learned the hard way that we cannot win it for them.

I would like it to be noted, for the record, then, Mr. Chairman, that my support of House Resolution 613, specifically includes—though this, unfortunately, cannot now formally be made a part of that resolution's wording—my support of our withdrawal policy, and of the "Vietnamization" of whatever remains of the conflict, and should be taken to indicate my urging of the President to complete the withdrawal of at least all our ground forces from Vietnam at the earliest practicable date.

In so saying, I am not purposely ignoring the opinions of a solid and vocal minority viewpoint within my own congressional district—at least, I believe it to be a minority viewpoint—that worries about the timing of such a withdrawal process, wants it speeded up even further by the President, or at the direction of the Congress, if necessary, and even beyond that point worries about the ultimate meaning of our attempt to "Vietnamize" the war with its possible connotations of an intent on our part to go on prolonging the conflict, with its death and destruction, through our support of the present Saigon regime, though the burden of that death and destruction would shortly be carried less and less by us and more and more by the people of South Vietnam.

Those who subscribe to this minority viewpoint ask, in truth, some legitimate policy questions—questions to which we have not, in our consideration of House Resolution 613, really addressed ourselves.

To them, permit me merely to say, let the debate go on—as it will in any event—but let it go on through constructive channels, not in the streets where foreign policy cannot be made, but here in such places as this Chamber, and through the more familiar and traditional manner of working of our governmental institutions.

The adoption of this resolution does not not preclude such an event—it may, in fact, encourage such a process and, if so, that is another reason why I am glad to vote for its enactment.

Mr. Chairman, we face together—as a Congress and as a Nation—one of the most difficult problems ever encountered in the history of this Republic. That problem is composed of mistaken public attitudes—and presidential decisions in past years that have proven to be unwise but that more alert and more responsible Congresses in those years might have prevented; it is composed, too, of our awareness of our responsibility to those young men who, by lot, may have been chosen last night for future service in the Armed Forces in such places as Vietnam, and of the selfless sacrifice the parents of such as 2d Lt. Terrence C. Graves have made in behalf of this Nation's often uncertain purposes, a sacrifice that, somehow, must not altogether have been made in vain.

It is a heavy burden we bear—but a burden we must bear, along with President Nixon, with all the courage and wisdom we can summon forth.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Chairman, while we are today considering the House resolution for a just peace in Vietnam, I would like to offer as substantiating evidence of the people's support for the President's policy the results of a survey which I recently conducted among my constituents.

This survey, which was sent to all my constituents—over 688,000—indicates that the great majority support President Nixon's Vietnam policy. The preliminary results have been tabulated as follows:

I support President Nixon's Vietnam plans: 60%.

I favor immediate unilateral withdrawal of all troops: 23%.

I favor an all-out effort to win the war in Vietnam: 17%.

Mr. Chairman, judging from the opinions of my constituents, I believe that congressional approval of this resolution will indicate that the views of the people are truly represented in the Halls of Government.

These views from the citizens of Maryland's Fifth Congressional District correlate highly with the recent Gallup poll conducted on the final day of the November Vietnam moratorium which indicated that only one adult in five backs the war protesters who favor immediate and total withdrawal of troops from Vietnam.

I firmly believe that most Americans now realize, as a result of the President's November 3 speech, that this country is committed to a just and honorable solution to the Vietnam conflict. Most Americans want our boys to come home but they are aware of the time element required for a true and effective Vietnamization of the war. It is clear that gradual withdrawal is the only feasible or possible alternative for U.S. policy.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to listen to the voices of American citizens around the country who are articulating the views of the silent majority in letters, opinion polls, demonstrations, and many other forms—to listen and to heed their call by exhibiting a resounding measure of support for our President through approval of this resolution.

Mr. OLSEN. Mr. Chairman, although I have today voted in support of the President's efforts to find a just end to the war in Vietnam, I have done so with strong reservations. I regret that the House resolution made not mention of scheduled troop withdrawals, the continuation of which I most adamantly endorse. I will continue to seek aggressively further commitment from the administration in this regard.

I further consider it not only the right of the Congress to advise the President in his efforts toward peace, but I submit that we have an obligation to do so. I intend to fulfill this obligation.

In the drafting of this resolution, I would have much preferred the version cosponsored in the Senate by my Montana colleagues, MIKE MANSFIELD and LEE METCALF. However, I would go beyond this resolution also, in expressing the unqualified intention of the Congress to end this disastrous war and bring peace to Southeast Asia.

I can support this resolution in that it is designed as an effort toward peace. But this must not be construed as congressional approval of a blank check for future actions by the administration.

Mr. COHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate and quite frankly I was first disposed to vote for the resolution. However, the more I listened to the variety of interpretations that are possible and the doubtful value and effect of the resolution itself has convinced me to cast my vote against the resolution.

With all the sound and the fury of the discussion in these hours of debate, the ambiguity of the resolution stands out. It badly needs clarification and amendment. This is the reason I voted against the previous question and against the closed rule. The haste with which the bill was brought to the floor without hearings suggests that it badly needs perfecting amendments.

Let me say in spite of my vote against this vague and imperfect resolution I want it to be known that I support the President of the United States in liquidating this war with all deliberate speed. It was because of this position that I recently cosponsored a resolution that offered more direction to the President. This resolution stated:

Resolved, That it is the sense of Congress that U.S. forces in South Vietnam should be systematically withdrawn on an orderly and fixed schedule—neither precipitate nor contingent on factors beyond our control—to extend only over such period of time as shall be necessary to (a) provide for the safety of United States forces, (b) secure the release of American prisoners of war, (c) assist any Vietnamese desiring asylum, and (d) enable the United States to make an orderly disposition of its facilities in South Vietnam.

Unfortunately, this resolution did not receive the "legislative speed-up" of House Resolution 613. We are now faced with a vote on a resolution that is susceptible to many interpretations.

Even though this House Resolution 613 is vague, I do not feel that it provides blanket authority for the President in South Vietnam. Indeed the two original sponsors from our side of the aisle, Mr. HAYS and Mr. WRIGHT, said that this resolution was to be a "peace" not a war resolution. All Members of this House desire peace, but as has been pointed out so many times, there is considerable division as to the means to achieve peace. I am convinced that whatever the vote on this resolution, each Member of this Chamber will continue to speak out constructively on Vietnam. I certainly intend to do so.

There is a related point I wish to make. This resolution can be interpreted as an unqualified endorsement of the President's November 3 speech. This can be seen from the words of the President himself in his unprecedented appearance before this Chamber in which he said:

Over 300 Members of the House had joined in sponsoring a resolution for a just peace in Vietnam along the lines of the proposal that I made in a speech on November 3.

In addition, the media has interpreted this resolution as an unqualified endorsement of the President's policy. I do not agree with this interpretation, nor do I think it a fair and legitimate evaluation. For myself, I choose to reserve judgment on the President's handling of the war, yet I must admit that I was disappointed in the rhetorical November 3 statement that seems more bellicose than the President's prior statements on Vietnam.

I yield to no man in supporting the President in foreign affairs, but given the divisive nature of this war, the President must be judged by his actions.

In place of a clear statement of intention, we have the November 3 speech and several informal reports that are confusing and somewhat contradictory to say the least. There are reports that the Department of Defense will continue withdrawal of U.S. troops unannounced, yet Secretary of Defense Laird is reported to have said that our support troop commitment will be on the order of 150,000 to 200,000 for the foreseeable future. Thus, I feel that it is imperative for the President—perhaps at his December 8 news conference—to specify his plans and timetable for Vietnam.

There are other steps the President could take.

He must rapidly appoint a leading well-known negotiator to the Paris talks to keep these negotiations viable. Most importantly we must actively use our influence to make the Government of South Vietnam more representative to the people. It seems foolhardy to speak of "Vietnamization" of the war when the Government of South Vietnam is held in such low esteem by its own citizens. I have commented on numerous occasions on the vital aspect of a solution to the Vietnam war. The President's speech of November 3 and this resolution do nothing to take this vital factor into account. Finally, the President must continue to reduce the level of fighting in South Vietnam.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, given my grave doubts about the current direction of this war, the desire of the present Government of South Vietnam to broaden its base or facilitate free elections, and the uncertain pace of the liquidation of the U.S. commitment, I will not support this resolution. I will continue to support the President as he takes constructive steps toward the liquidation of this Vietnam quagmire.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the House of Representatives passed the rule on House Resolution 613, entitled "Toward Peace With Justice in Vietnam," thus limiting debate and closing the resolution to amendment. I voted against that action.

Today, I plan again to vote against this resolution, which I view as a hastily conceived, open-ended, and ill-defined commitment.

This resolution does not give the President any power he does not already have. It does not add to his flexibility, but rather places the House of Representatives in a most inflexible position and one which detracts from its ability to operate as a separate unit from the executive branch—which is, perhaps, its greatest strength. By our action here today, we abrogate this power, and on a subject which causes such a great distress to the people of our country and, indeed, to people everywhere.

House Resolution 613 is the first Vietnam resolution to be brought to the floor of the House in 5 years. It was drafted prior to the President's November 3, 1969 policy statement and was not intended, therefore, to specifically support that policy.

Despite this fact, the President thanked the cosponsors of this resolution on November 13 for their complete endorsement of his policy as stated on November 3. On that same day, the resolution was reported out by the House Foreign Affairs Committee after oniy 1 hour and 20 minutes of closed-door consideration and without any hearings. It was brought up on the floor yesterday under a closed rule, which limited debate and prevented amendment. This series of hasty steps has not only added to the confusion and uncertainty surrounding the resolution, but has been a mockery of the legislative responsibilities of this body.

The very simplicity of this resolution belies the great complexities of the issues involved. We in the Congress must recognize that we cannot attack extremely complex problems such as this with oversimplified solutions and insufficient means. We have sought to resolve a history of conflict in Vietnam through an hour-and-a-half closed-door hearing and less than 4 hours of debate. We in the Congress owe more than this to the American people.

I am especially concerned, furthermore, that some of the constructive suggestions of many of my colleagues concerning this resolution have been precluded under this rule. For example, the language introduced by Representative PAUL FINDLEY in House Resolution 564 stated:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the substantial reductions in the United States ground combat forces in Vietnam already directed are in the national interest and that the President be supported in his expressed determination to withdraw our remaining such forces at the earliest practicable date.

The President has clearly expressed his support for this language in a letter to Representative FINDLEY. However, this language, which is only one example of many constructive suggestions, has not been afforded the opportunity of being introduced on the floor. There has been no chance to add or change so much as one single word of this resolution.

I do not support House Resolution 613 for these reasons, and for one other very critical reason. And that is this. We in the Congress should have learned, I believe, the inherent dangers of such open-ended resolutions as House Resolution 613. The Gulf of Tonkin resolution has been mentioned several times already this afternoon as an example. And I think that the simple facts are clear: resolutions of this kind are often easy to pass, but are very, very difficult to repeal. As experience has shown, the language in resolutions such as this, while susceptible to the problem or issue at hand, can often be made to fit any set of circumstances in the future, no matter how much conditions may have changed. Moreover, this resolution allows the President to pursue such divergent alternatives as escalating the war or making a precipitous withdrawal of our forces—neither of which extreme alternatives countenance.

There is no doubt that this resolution will be viewed by many as a vaguely worded expression of general support for the President in his efforts to extricate this country from our involvement in Vietnam. There is no doubt that most of its supporters intend it to be exactly that. But it is also true that many of us here recall all too clearly another such general expression of support, which was employed in circumstances and for purposes well beyond the remotest intentions of those who voted for it only five years ago. And yet, this body devoted more effort to the consideration of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution than we have to this, its successor.

I have said that I support the President's efforts to withdraw our troops and I will support his greater efforts in this direction. I now reaffirm that support. But I should not endorse a blanket statement which reads as an open-ended commitment to continue our effort in South Vietnam until such time as forces beyond the control of this body decree otherwise.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613 which is designed to bring about peace with justice in Vietnam. Since the President of the United States, the Honorable Richard Nixon went to the people of this country with his Vietnam policy, I have received untold numbers of letters indicating my constituency's support of the President and asking me to lend my support wherever and whenever possible to his program.

It takes two to negotiate, and it is quite evident that Hanoi feels they can wait us out, particularly when they view the demonstrations throughout our country which lend credence to the statement that we are divided on the subject of Vietnam. Who, but the Congress, and particularly the House of Representatives who are closely associated with the people, can come most nearly to correcting this false impression. Only when the Communists are convinced that this country is united in their efforts and goals in Vietnam, can we sit across the negotiating table from them with strength in our convictions and attain some goals toward peace. The adoption of this resolution will give the President the symbol of unanimity he needs to move swiftly ahead on his program for peace.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, I agree with proponents of this resolution who have said this is not a partisan matter. It is above partisanship and I would take the same position I take today were there a Democratic President in the White House. I conceive the issue presented by this resolution to be: Should this House give blanket approval to the President's policies in Vietnam without being fully aware of what those policies are and where they may lead?

Taken in the abstract, who can find fault with the language in this resolution? We are all for peace. We are all for a just peace. We are all for negotiations looking to the establishment of a just peace. All of us want this horrible war to be over and our troops returned to their homes.

But, Mr. Chairman, the words in this resolution cannot be considered in the abstract. President Nixon gave new meaning to the words of the resolution when he appeared in the House on November 13 and referred to this resolution as "a resolution for a just peace in Vietnam along the lines of the proposal that I made in a speech on November 3." He also in that statement described supporters of the resolution as "well over a majority supporting the policy of the President of the United States." The President's statements make this resolution a policy statement, for no matter how vehemently those who support this resolution may deny any connection, one exists. It cannot be gainsaid that he added a very important element. His speech of November 3 has become an inseparable part of this bill. It is most important, therefore, that we must know the full implications of his policy statements in that speech before we approve this resolution. No effort was made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to determine these.

Why did the Committee on Foreign Affairs not hold hearings on this resolution? Why should Members of the House be prevented from presenting their ideas and amendments?

I would have thought that the aftertaste of the Bay of Tonkin resolution was still in Members' mouths, strong enough to require a strict and careful analysis of any resolution approving Presidential action in Vietnam both retrospectively and prospectively as this does. It is clear from this debate that this resolution has as many meanings as there are Members of this House. There is difference and contradiction of its meaning even among its sponsors.

One is reminded of the allegory of the three blind men who felt different parts of an elephant and came to differing views on what the elephant represented. Proponents say this resolution is no affirmation of any policy. They reject the President's interpretation and say "that does not control. It is what we in this House mean it to say." But this resolution specifically is an affirmation of the President's efforts, of what he has done. His views, therefore, of what he conceives the effect of this resolution to be will control his actions. No matter what is said in this House to the contrary, this resolution will be heralded far and wide as support for the President's November 3 statement by this House.

What are the implications of the President's Vietnamization policy which is said by his administration to be the path to peace? Does that policy mean that we will stay in Vietnam in force if negotiations in Paris fail?

Does it mean that this Government will support the Thieu-Ky regime until the next Vietnamese election? Do the proponents of this resolution approve the indefinite open endedness of the Vietnamization process even if it takes many years? That possibility is certainly in prospect, for the administration in its statement of agreement with Japan on Okinawa asked for the use in 1972 of that island for our planes in the event the war in Vietnam is still going on.

These are only some of the questions that come readily to mind. What are the answers to these questions? The answer given by the committee on the floor is "read the words of the resolution," as though it had the answers which obviously it does not.

Mr. Chairman, this might have been a most constructive debate, one that might have resulted in fashioning a resolution in which all of us could take pride. But this debate was doomed from the beginning because of lack of time for members to speak their thoughts and because of the closed rule procedure which forbade amendments.

The Vietnam issue is much too complex to be treated in this arbitrary manner which does little justice to the resolution or to the great traditions of this House. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in the case of Towne v. Eisner, 245 U.S. 418 said:

> A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged. It is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances in the time in which it is used.

I am convinced that the words of this resolution may be given implications and meanings unknown even to the sponsors—that it may be used, even as was the Bay of Tonkin resolution, to launch Presidential initiatives not intended by those approving it. I want to know what I am voting for before I give my approval to an important policy measure of this kind. There has not been adequate deliberation given to this resolution. Accordingly, I will vote against it.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am voting in support of House Resolution 613. Some time ago, I cosponsored a resolution which was similar to the one which is presently under consideration.

With the language of this resolution before us it seems to me impossible to do other than support it. Certainly few would willingly express opposition to the objectives stated therein.

We do support the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam and we affirm the hope of the people of the United States for such a peace. Therefore it would seem to me that support should be automatically forthcoming.

Now I can understand that many people do not like the war in Vietnam. I am not happy about it myself. Many wish to differ with the President about his conduct of the peace negotiations and his management of our withdrawal. I certainly reserve to myself the right to criticize these activities whenever I deem it advisable, but I do not consider that this resolution limits me in any way in such criticism.

Having now experienced several of these "sense of Congress" resolutions in moments of international crises, I am free to say that I have very grave reservations about their value. Circumstances change and factual situations change and the fact remains that there are better ways of supporting a Presidential search for peace than by means of congressional resolutions.

It has been said that no resolution is needed to express the hope of the Congress and the public for peace in Vietnam and the belief that President Nixon does seek peace there.

I feel that this is true, but having the resolution before us one would not wish for international reasons to do other than give it clear and substantial support.

It is with this reasoning therefore, that I support the resolution, taking it as a general expression of support, but reserving all options to differ at any time in the future with any specific policy of the President or the administration with which I disagree.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the "peace in Vietnam" resolution. I am for peace. I am for any plan which will result in a "just peace." I do not see how any Member of this House or the other body can object to a call for peace in Vietnam or anywhere in the world.

But, I am uneasy about the resolution now before us. I am uneasy about what the end results of this particular resolution could be. I have the feeling we may be buying a pie that is all crust and no filling.

The resolution calls for formal endorsement of President Nixon's plan to achieve a "just peace"; but, it does not spell out how that goal is to be achieved. We have no details of the President's plan to obtain his objective. We have no definition of the President's interpretation of a "just peace." Presidents Kennedy and Johnson had their particular ideas of a "just peace." Does Mr. Nixon's plan follow along the same line?

The resolution before us says little except we are for the President's plan whatever it is. This resolution was considered for less than 2 hours by the Foreign Affairs Committee. There were no hearings held on it and the measure is reported out under closed rule. This prevents the House from working its will on the resolution; from offering amendments or changing the language. I feel we should have had the opportunity to refine the resolution; to offer suggestions and debate their merits.

While I support the resolution, I am concerned that if it passes we will be giving President Nixon, in effect, a blank check to purchase his "just peace." We have endorsed the check, but the amount we will have to pay has not been specified. We will have given President Nixon carte blanche for whatever his plans are to achieve his "just peace." I sincerely pray our action will not come back to haunt us. I am supporting the resolution in the fervent hope it brings us the peace we all desire.

Mr. DANIELS of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in view of the intense and lengthy debate on House Resolution 613 on the floor of the House I think it only proper and responsible that I record my reasons for giving the resolution my support.

The opponents contended that the resolution gives blanket support to the President's future conduct of the war regardless of what changes in conditions or policy might occur in the future. I do not agree.

If such were the plain meaning interpretation of the resolution I could not and would not in good conscience support it. A resolution so worded as to conform to the interpretation given House Resolution 613 by its opponents would fly in the face of the constitutional responsibility of this House.

House Resolution 613, however, does not give such blanket support. Chairman WAYNE HAYS, who managed the bill, gave such assurances upon which I relied and with which I concur when he stated:

> There is no authority in [the resolution] to escalate the war. There is no blank check about troops. We are simply affirming that this House of Representatives [is] saying here that we are for peace with justice in Vietnam; we are for free elections, and we are for getting the war over. [We] are not saying anything else but that. . . . The language of the resolution is simple and direct. There are no hidden meanings. It gives no authority to the President and takes none away. Its entire thrust is in the direction of peace.

With those assurances, given and taken in good faith, I believe that I have represented the earnest desire of my constituency and myself for a "just peace."

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Chairman, for the first time in 5 years, this House has an opportunity to take a thoroughgoing look at Vietnam policy, and yet this resolution has been rushed through the committee in an 80-minute executive session, with no opportunity for testimony from the public—either for or against—nor was there any opportunity until this moment for Members of Congress to express their views. That procedure was deplorable in itself, but to make matters worse, the resolution is now presented on the House floor under a closed rule, precluding any opportunity for amendment.

How can we have a meaningful debate on so crucial an issue when each Member of this House is effectively limited to a mere 30 seconds in which to express his views.

Moreover, the 80 minutes of committee consideration in executive session did not even establish a public record which would serve as an official document and basis for debate on the House floor. Limitations such as these on the most critical issue in this country's foreign relations are unconscionable.

Several aspects of this resolution are deeply disturbing: It is so ambiguous that it dangerously approaches writing a blank check for the administration to act unilaterally on foreign policy matters.

Moreover, the fact that the administration so eagerly embraced the resolution shortly after the President's November 3 statement makes it look all the more that we are writing a blanket endorsement of his conduct of the war.

Moreover, this resolution proposes to support a plan of managing the Vietnam war which the President has yet to spell out. He told the Nation during his campaign last year that he had a plan to end the war. We have waited patiently for almost a year, and still have no idea of what that plan is. Nor does this resolution give us any better idea of what it may be.

Yet today we are asked blindly to endorse that plan, under a closed rule, with no consideration of such alternatives as a specific, precise schedule of troop withdrawal; internationally supervised free elections; establishment of a coalition government, and so forth.

I feel very strongly that we must have as broad and open and complete a discussion as possible on an issue so vital as this before the measure is brought up for consideration on the House floor.

I strongly feel that the resolution should be sent back to committee for broad-scale policy hearings, and, accordingly, I voted for recommittal. Since that effort did not succeed, I voted against the resolution.

This House has been known to spend years considering even the most minor legislative innovation, yet this afternoon we witness the spectacle of one of the most important issues of this decade, and certainly one which has dominated recent history, being rushed through in a matter of hours and with no public hearings.

We abuse the historic processes of this body with such a procedure; we abuse the trust reposed in us by our constituents; and I cannot in good conscience give such a procedure my support.

I do wholeheartedly support any initiative, any imaginative effort, which will end this tragic war. I hope and pray that the President will use all the resources at his command and call upon all that is best in the American people to respond to the challenge of peace.

I call also upon those on the international scene who are vitally concerned with the cessation of this war to help our President, and I urge him to accept that help, in every way possible, to come to a just decision for a lasting peace both for the United States and for Vietnam.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, it was an honor for me to join our distinguished colleague from Texas, JIM WRIGHT, in cosponsoring, together with more than three-fourths of the membership of this House, this resolution toward peace with justice in Vietnam.

In the past, I have never cherished illusions on the potential efficacy of some of the sense resolutions that have been brought before this House for approval. Such resolutions do not have either the force or effect of law, and they are simply formal expressions of the opinion of the majority of our membership. The present resolution and circumstances are uniquely different. A very great deal indeed depends on whether we vote for or against the resolution which is before us today.

Hanoi has remained intransigent and there has been no progress at the Paris peace talks because the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong believe we are a "nation deeply divided, almost wholly unwilling to continue the effort—and virtually on the point of internal political collapse." They have come to believe their own propaganda that they have only to hold out, and growing U.S. disunity and opposition to the war will force U.S. abandonment.

Why do they believe this? They believe it is because it is inconceivable to them that a strong and purposeful democracy can pursue its course while permitting the strongest expressions of dissent from people in all walks of life.

From what we know of the repressions of communism, it is not too difficult to understand their misconception of the U.S. position. Every time an elected official in the United States speaks out against our involvement in Vietnam, he is avidly read and quoted in North Vietnam and other parts of the Communist world. Instead of realizing he is simply exercising his inherent right of dissent, the other side takes it as proof we are falling apart at the seams.

I recently obtained a list of quotations used by the Communists which they took from public statements made by U.S. elected officials. Let me read several of them which were broadcast over Hanoi radio and also tauntingly flung at our Paris negotiators as evidence that our President lacked public support for his peace efforts. Here they are:

We cannot use the blood of American youth to save a corrupt regime like the regime to which the United States is tied in Saigon.

To continue the war in Vietnam can bring only tragedy to the country.

The American people must not continue indefinitely to sacrifice its youth or link its national interest to the fate of the military regime in Saigon.

The most correct and reasonable course of action is withdrawal and not to go on with that error.

It is stupid and irresponsible to continue to send our young men to their death.

The only way to put an end to the war is to withdraw our troops.

The executive branch in our country has been and continues to be dishonest vis-a-vis the American people.

There are many more. I have cited only these as representative examples. They are from the speeches of less than a score of elected individuals, but is it any wonder that the wishful thinkers of Hanoi have let themselves be hoodwinked by such statements emanating from such impressively high sources? I do not question the sincerity or the patriotism of those Americans who have been so quoted. They want to see the end of the war, but they do not want to see the end of the war any quicker than I or the rest of us do. They want peace, but they do not want peace any more earnestly than I or the rest of us do. I would not make such statements myself, first because I do not believe they are correct, and second because I would not want to say anything which could mistakenly encourage the other side to prolong the war and refuse to negotiate meaningfully.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Eighty-four Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLYNT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Resoultion 613, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 384 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. When the point of order that a quorum was not present was made, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HAYS) had 10 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee rose I had just finished reading a series of quotations from Members of the House and Senate which have been read back to our negotiators in Paris by the North Vietnamese, leading them to believe that all they have to do is sit it out and they can get their own way.

I will read the last one again for the benefit of those who were not there. One of the quotes is:

The executive branch in our country has been and continues to be dishonest vis-a-vis the American people.

There are many more. I have cited only these as representative examples. They are from the speeches of less than a score of elected individuals, but is it any wonder that the wishful thinkers of Hanoi have let themselves be hoodwinked by such statements emanating from impressively high sources?

Mr. Chairman, we will be voting on this resolution in a very few minutes under the rule. I understand there will be a motion to recommit offered, I hear now by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FULTON) which will insert a sentence urging the President to continue to press Hanoi to accept the Geneva protocol on the treatment of prisoners of war.

I will say that the gentleman was the only Member on his side to vote against the resolution in the committee. If getting this in under his name will bring him over on the resolution, I guess the price is worth it. I have no objection. I believe it might do some good.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. I, too, understand the motion to recommit to be of the same nature. If that is the case, I would have no objection to the addition of such a clause, and feel that most Members probably support such a clause.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ADAIR. I believe it is fair to say that the attitude on this side of the aisle is the same as that previously expressed. We have no objection to the motion.

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield, very briefly.

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. My feeling is that we should not be pulling out our forces and abandoning our prisoners of war.

Mr. HAYS. I do not yield for a speech. I want the gentleman to talk about the motion to recommit.

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. That is why I put the language in the motion to recommit.

Mr. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BURTON of California. I should like to pose a question to the chief sponsor of the resolution, the gentleman from Texas.

Did I correctly hear the gentleman that this amendment was acceptable to the gentleman?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have seen a copy of the amendment. If the original motion is as it was represented to me, yes. I want North Vietnam to abide by the protocol on the treatment of prisoners of war; yes, I do.

Mr. BURTON of California. I expect that some Members on this side of the aisle would have appreciated such alacrity in compliance with some of the suggestions they had for clarification of this resolution.

Mr. HAYS. I will say to the gentleman, under the rule we had no way of getting at it. I told the Rules Committee I had no objection to a rule making it in order.

Mr. BURTON of California. My remarks were not addressed to the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. I will say personally, as one individual, I will accept what the rules put before the House.

I should like to continue my statement if I may. If I have time at the end, I will yield further.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one quick question?

Mr. HAYS. All right; I yield.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I would hope that the gentleman and all the gentlemen in support of this resolution will commit to all of us that we will have an opportunity to have a record vote on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HAYS. Under the rules of the House, if enough Members stand up there is no way I can prevent it.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. In other words, the gentleman is going to stand up, too?

Mr. HAYS. No, I am not. I do not see any reason to. If the gentleman can get enough Members to stand up, that is up to him. Probably he can. I have no objection if he does. I am not averse to voting.

Mr. Chairman, there have been charges made here that this resolution is a resolution of disunity. Nothing could be further from the truth. I have said repeatedly in the debate, without many Members on the floor, that there is no hidden meaning. It is a resolution for negotiated peace, and it says it is the sense of the House that we ought to have free elections in South Vietnam. That is all there is to it—nothing more and nothing less. And I do not mind saying that I was slightly amazed when I heard the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOWENSTEIN) say that this is a resolution of disunity. And it shook me a little bit, because he ought to be an authority on that subject; he has made a career out of it. He is the outstanding example of how to get into Congress by dissent. And I am not criticizing him. But this resolution is not a resolution of disunity. It is a resolution of unity. This is a resolution to show the world the people of this country want a just, negotiated peace.

Some people, very cutely, I think, try to trap some of us by saying, "Well, if you have free elections in South Vietnam and you get a Communist government, where does that leave you?" If the people of South Vietnam under free elections supervised by neutrals vote for communism, then I say they ought to have it and it is good enough for them, if that is what they want.

However, I will say this to you: There has never been a nation in the history of the world that has freely voted communism upon themselves. Not one—not one. I heard a lot of criticism about the Saigon government. I do not stand here vouching that the Saigon government is perfect, near perfect, or half perfect, but the Saigon government is no worse than and probably a lot better than the Hanoi government. I think that the Saigon government will agree to free elections, when all we are trying to get Hanoi to do is to do likewise.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to close by talking to my friends on the Democratic side of the aisle. Some of you were here and some were not in the Eisenhower administration. I remember two people that many of you have forgotten who both happened to be from Texas who called us into caucus on more than one occasion and said, "You cannot win elections by being against the President just because he is a Republican; by saying we will support him when he is right and we will disagree with him when he is wrong." Mr. Eisenhower, the greatest popular figure up to that time in the history of this country in election processes brought in a Republican Congress which he kept for 2 years. The other 6 years we were in the majority because we were a responsible majority. Those two distinguished gentlemen were Sam Rayburn and the previous President Lyndon Johnson, who was the last Democratic President of this country. That was their philosophy. I have heard Members say to me in the cloakroom and other places, "I will not vote for this resolution because it helps Nixon." Let me say to you today that if this resolution helps Mr. Nixon, that is all right with me, too. I simply want to say to the country as one person, and I think the majority of this House and I hope the majority of my party will, that we are responsible, we are for peace, we are for peace with justice, we are for free elections, we are for getting this war over.

And, you know something? The American people are not as stupid as some of the New Left would have you believe. They can figure out why you might vote for this resolution and they can figure out why you might vote against it, and any man and any woman in this House has the right to vote, of course, as they please. I will not go into their districts and criticize them for it. I am just saying again for the last time that there is no hidden meaning in this resolution. There is no authority in it to escalate the war. There is no blank check about troops. We are simply affirming that this House of Representatives in a resolution which was written here—not written downtown and sent up here but written here—largely by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), although some of us suggested a change or two—which was certainly widely signed, by more than 300 Members of the House—we are saying here that we are for a peace with justice in Vietnam; we are for free elections; and we are for getting the war over. You are not saying anything else but that if you vote for it. And do not think that the American people cannot figure out whether you are playing politics or whether you are not.

That is why I said a minute ago that there is a vast difference between this simple House resolution and some of the previous sense resolutions we have voted on in past years. I am not talking about the so-called Gulf of Tonkin resolution. It was not a simple sense resolution, but a joint resolution having the full force and effect of law.

The timing of this resolution and its urgency is directly related to the lives of our boys now serving in Vietnam. Its primary purpose is to give proof to the Communists that they are wrong in their assessment of the U.S. position. It is to assure them that, despite the disagreement of a relatively few, the House of Representatives and the Americans we represent do, by a tremendous majority, support our President "in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam."

The language of the resolution is simple and direct. There are no hidden meanings. It gives no authority to the President and it takes none away. Its entire thrust is in the direction of peace. In just one sentence, it emphasizes and reemphasizes our earnest hope for a just peace in Vietnam. I think most of us realize that it is just about impossible to combine any given number of words into a formula that would please everybody. JIM WRIGHT has succeeded in drafting an affirmation of support which over three-fourths of us have been glad to cosponsor. Some few would have liked to hedge it with restrictions; some would have preferred to broaden it to the point of reemphasizing the authorities of the Tonkin Gulf resolution. The single simple sentence of House Resolution 613 offers a focal point for us to bypass all our minor differences, because all of us have a common objective, the end of the war through a just peace.

A minority of the committee was disappointed because hearings were not held on the resolution. The complaint was made by a few that the committee failed to follow past precedents and hear witnesses on this resolution. I respectfully suggest that if hearings had been held, they would have changed no opinions, shifted no votes, nor provided any new information. If there has ever been a subject which has evoked continuous study, constant comment, and the need and desire to keep informed on developments, it is that of our involvement in Vietnam. Millions of words on Vietnam have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. All of us have listened to countless speeches and have ourselves spoken on this question. The day before House Resolution 613 was introduced, the Nation was given a full and detailed report by the Commander in Chief of the United States himself on his efforts to secure peace. I do not know of any single witness who could have contributed more than the President to our understanding of the present situation. We ordinarily ask for witnesses to learn the effects of proposed legislation. We certainly did not need to ask anybody to assess the force and effect of the adoption of this simple one-sentence resolution by the 435 Members of this House. I am also convinced that the membership of the House is so well versed on the facts that it needs no outside help in drafting the words of a resolution to express support for the President "in his efforts to negotiate a just peace."

I want to close these remarks with my most earnest appeal that we show unity in backing the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam. This resolution will be confirming evidence by the House of Representatives that our tolerance and acceptance of dissent here at home is a measure of the true strength of a democracy such as ours, and not the imminent sign of collapse the Communists think. We have every reason to hope this affirmation of our support of the President in his efforts will promote peace and help save American as well as Vietnamese lives. I urge its unanimous adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired.

Under the rule, House Resolution 613 shall be considered as having been read for amendment.

The resolution is as follows:

H. RES. 613

Resolved, That the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam, expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for such a peace, calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith toward the Government of North Vietnam, approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body, and that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections, and supports the President in his call upon the Government of North Vietnam to announce its willingness to honor such elections and to abide by such results and to allow the issues in controversy to be peacefully so resolved in order that the war may be ended and peace may be restored at last in Southeast Asia.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, no amendments are in order to the resolution except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Are there any committee amendments?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, there are no committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLYNT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Resolution 613, toward peace with justice in Vietnam, pursuant to House Resolution 722, he reported the resolution back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the resolution.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. FULTON OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. I am, Mr. Speaker, in its present form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania moves to recommit H. Res. 613 to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to the Committee to report the Resolution back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 1, line 7, after the comma, insert the following: "requests the President to continue to press the Government of North Vietnam to abide by the Geneva Convention of 1949 in the treatment of prisoners of war,".

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 392, nays 0, not voting 41, as follows:

STATEMENT

The Managers on the part of the House at a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 14159) making appropriations for Public Works for water, pollution control, and power development, including the Corps of Engineers-Civil, the Panama Canal, the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, the Bureau of Reclamation, power agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Atomic Energy Commission, and related independent agencies and commissions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1970, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments; namely:

TITLE I—ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

Operating expenses

Amendment No. 1: Appropriates $1,862,269,000 instead of $1,884,269,000 as proposed by the House, and $1,840,269,000 as proposed by the Senate. The reduction below the House bill is based on anticipated slippage in the operating programs. The conferees are in agreement that within the funds made available provision should be made for the full operation of the two K reactors at Richland, Washington.

Plant and capital equipment

Amendment No. 2: Appropriates $355,500,000 instead of $343,500,000 as proposed by the House, and $377,525,000 as proposed by the Senate. The increase over the House bill consists of $6,000,000 for the 200-BEV accelerator and $6,000,000 for capital equipment not related to construction. The conferees are in agreement that provision should be made within available funds for construction of the waste storage tanks at Richland, Washington, required in connection with full operation of the two K reactors.

TITLE II—DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE—CIVIL

Department of the Army

Corps of Engineers—Civil

General investigations

Amendment No. 3: Appropriates $41,191,000 instead of $40,600,000 as proposed by the House and $41,760,000 as proposed by the Senate. The increase over the House bill includes $200,000 to initiate the International Field Year on the Great Lakes, $40,000 for the Texas water and pollution study; and $351,000 for studies as listed below.

The conferees are in agreement that the International Field Year on the Great Lakes shall be so planned as to minimize annual funding requirements until the general fiscal situation improves.

The increase provided over the House bill shall be allocated to the following studies:

Alaska: (N) Cook Inlet $20,000
California: (N) San Francisco Bay Area (in depth) ..... [1] 30,000
Florida: (N) St. Lucie Inlet ..... [1] 25,000
